The one Frenchman in the party handed him a pen. He drew forward two bulky documents engrossed in duplicate and painstakingly set on them his name, "B. Franklin." Then he passed them on to his two American colleagues, Silas Deane and Arthur Lee, and going over to the fireplace chatted a few moments with the French official, Conrad Alexander Gerard, secretary of the council of state. The other Americans signed and sealed. M. Gerard gathered up the documents and gave them to Franklin. With a bow and congratulations on the event, he took his leave.

A GREAT MOMENT

The three Americans looked at one another. There was little doubt in their minds, or, in fact, that the American Revolution was won. Here in this obscure room they had signed for the new Nation its first treaties with a foreign power. France had not only recognized the United States and instituted trade and consular relations in the "treaty of amity and commerce," which they had been commissioned by their Congress to obtain; she had gone further. In a "treaty of alliance, eventual and defensive," she had anticipated making common cause against Great Britain with the United States.

French ports would now be freely open to American warships and sea raiders—to Wickes and Conyngham, and to John Paul Jones, who a few days later was to receive in a French harbor the first foreign salute to the American flag. Soon a French fleet, along with munitions, was to be on its way to aid the beleaguered United States.

February 6, 1778, marks a turning point in American history as decisive as any military victory. It marks as well the beginning of diplomatic relations between France and the United States. Had this year's Franco-American negotiations for renouncing war gone promptly through, it was the graceful suggestion of France that the new treaty should be signed to-morrow, on the sesquicentennial anniversary of the first.

For, oddly enough, France and America find themselves to-day, exactly as a century and a half ago, in process of making two treaties, one as to trade relations, the other as to the more general status regarding peace and war. But the circumstances are vastly different. In 1778 the emissaries of the thirteen Colonies, practically cut off from communication with home, had lingered in Paris a year, with instructions from their Congress to bargain and compromise and make the best terms they could to gain a mere trade agreement with France. In that time the taking of Philadelphia and defeat after defeat of Washington's arms at home had made their cause seem more and more hopeless.

How events operated with the persuasive personality of Benjamin Franklin to put through that first French treaty is one of the most colorful romances of American history. On the one hand was the faro-playing, extravagant court of Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette, devoted to the principle of monarchy. On the other were the three American commissioners, with no especial bonuses or privileges to offer. There was Silas Deane, a Connecticut farmer, none too practiced in diplomacy, and afterwards, probably unjustly, accused by Congress of diverting money to his own use. There was Arthur Lee, of Virginia, the arch-trouble maker, not yet 40, who served as a kind of counsel, having practiced law in England. And finally there was Benjamin Franklin, scientist, inventor, writer, printer, publisher, cosmopolite.

Medallions, medals, busts, portraits, and prints of him in all shapes and sizes were broadcast throughout Paris; there was hardly a family that did not have one of them over the fireplace. When he attended the Parliament of Paris, according to Silas Deane, "he passed through the crowd to the seat reserved for him amid the acclamations of the people—an honor seldom paid to their first princes of the blood."

But celebrity and diplomacy could probably have done little had there not been other powerful influences working for the American cause. First among these was doubtless the general French desire for revenge on Great Britain. For almost a century she had intermittently fought Britain for colonial empire, and by the peace of 1763 she had bitterly lost. She had been pushed out of India and the continent of North America.

It must also be remembered that though the King and court were unalterably monarchical, many of the people through the writings of Voltaire and the encyclopedists had long been imbued with the fundamental ideas of the rights of man. The explosion of the French Revolution was little more than a decade away, and thousands felt a vicarious joy in the American independence of the Old World forms.

BREACHES OF NEUTRALITY

So strong were these undercurrents of sympathy that the French Government had already condoned many a breach of neutrality. Chief among these was of course the supplying of munitions to the Americans by a firm of Spanish name, really conducted by the ardent Beaumarchais, who obtained many of his wares from Government arsenals. France also, under one pretext or another, allowed Paul Jones and his fellow privateers to refit in her harbors. And she permitted officers from the royal army to seek commissions in America.

It was some of the French King's own powder and shot, furnished via Beaumarchais, that by defeating Burgoyne finally probably forced the hand of Louis XVI in recognizing the Americans.

On Thursday, December 4, 1777, a carriage rolled up before Franklin's chateau at Passy, a suburb of Paris. Franklin, who had heard rumors of its arrival, rushed out to meet it. A young Bostonian envoy named Austin stepped hastily out.

"Sir," cried Franklin in an agony of suspense, "is Philadelphia taken?"

"Yes, sir," replied Austin.

Franklin clasped his hands and turned silently back toward the house.

"But, sir," pursued Austin, "I have greater news than that. General Burgoyne and his whole army are prisoners of war."

"The news," said Silas Deane afterwards, "was like a sovereign cordial to the dying."

Throughout France the news of the Battle of Saratoga was hailed as if it were a victory of French arms. On December 12 the French ministers met and on December 17 Gerard notified Franklin and his colleagues that the King was ready to make a treaty.

For the next few weeks the commissioners conferred. The first treaty of "amity and commerce" was substantially that which the Americans at the instance of Congress had first proposed. It had 31 articles, and gave each party "most-favored-nation" treatment in the ports and markets of the other. It went into the most minute details of fishing rights, mutual protection against pirates, and ships wrecked on shores of the other nation. In the second treaty of alliance against Great Britain the two countries mutually guaranteed to each other their present possessions in the Western Hemisphere. In case of conquest the United States was to have Canada and the Bermudas; France, islands in the Gulf of Mexico or near by.

Six weeks later the treaties were announced, and the Americans were presented to the King. Rigid requirements for court costumes were made for this ceremonial, and it is said that Franklin did his best to comply. He ordered a wig, but when it came it was not large enough, and none bigger could be found in Paris. So finally, in defiance of all rules, he drove to Versailles as he was, without wig or sword, in his plain black velvet suit with the white ruffles. The commissioners were, however, attended by a suite and many servants in gorgeous French liveries. In the court yard a regiment was drawn up.

CHAT WITH MARIE ANTOINETTE

According to Arthur Lee, the King was as little garbed for the occasion as Franklin. Indeed, he "had his hair undressed hanging down on his shoulders; no appearance of any preparation to receive us, nor any ceremony in doing it. The King appeared to speak with manly sincerity," assuring Congress of his friendship.

After that Franklin was the center of one fête after another. That night, according to Madame Campan, quoted by Parton, "the envoys went by particular invitation to the 'Jeu de la Reine,' where they found the royal family seated at play around a large table; a considerable heap of louis d'or lay before each of the players, and from the number of these the gaming appeared to be high. On this occasion Doctor Franklin was honored by the particular notice of the Queen, who courteously desired him to stand near to her, and as often as the game did not require her immediate attention she took occasion to speak to him in very obliging terms."

Soon after came Franklin's meeting with Voltaire, and other celebrations of the alliance in the French manner were not wanting.

ADDRESS BY PRESIDENT COOLIDGE—DEDICATION OF NATIONAL PRESS CLUB BUILDING

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very interesting address delivered by President Coolidge on Saturday night last on the occasion of the dedication of the new building of the National Press Club in Washington, D. C. Before the order is made for printing the address in the RECORD I desire to say a few words on the same subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Louisiana will proceed.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, the newspaper correspondents in Washington, acting through the National Press Club, have brought to a successful conclusion a very remarkable undertaking. They have erected a monumental building in the Capital which is to be the great nerve center of the press of America. From this great building more telegraphic news is destined to emanate than from any other one spot in the world.

The Federal Government is peculiarly dependent upon the press. The success of most of its constructive efforts depends to a high degree upon the publicity given them. That the press cooperates with the Government to an extent above and beyond the sheer news value of the subject matter is demonstrated daily.

The President of the United States on Saturday dedicated the beautiful building which is such a credit to our great publishing industry. He made a most interesting address on that occasion, which I have asked to have printed in the RECORD as a part of these remarks.

In addition, I wish to say that I have been in close touch with the development of this building project. I happen to know that a great many difficulties have had to be overcome in connection with this endeavor and that the press of the Nation and the Congress owes a great debt of gratitude to the group of correspondents who, with the aid and counsel of public-spirited bankers and business men, have been so conspicuously successful in this enterprise.

With its improved facilities and greater resources, the National Press Club is in a better position than ever to serve as the instrumentality in the Capital for the press of the Nation.

Mr. HEFLIN. May I ask the Senator from Louisiana a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. Is that the address in regard to which the New York World and the New York Times criticized the President this morning?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not know about that, but I read it yesterday very carefully in the Washington Post, and it is a most admirable address in every way, I think. I approve everything that the President said.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to printing the address in the RECORD?

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT COOLIDGE AT THE DEDICATION OF THE NEW BUILDING OF THE NATIONAL PRESS CLUB IN WASHINGTON, D. C., SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1928, AT 10 O'CLOCK P. M.

Mr. Chairman and fellow members of the National Press Club, while I have been a member of this club ever since I have been in Washington, it is seldom that I have had the opportunity to visit its quarters. Although I have not done much on your staff as a reporter, I have acquired a fairly good record as a contributing editor, and, though I have not written many stories, I have nevertheless had some success in the making of news. Even with all the ingenuity that characterizes the press of the present day, most writers are dependent upon some real news as a source of inspiration for their reporting.

Aside from the office which I hold, these accomplishments might be assumed to be some warrant for asking me to participate in the dedicatory exercises of our new club building. We are located here on one of the most important corners of the business section of the city of Washington. This site is historic ground. For a considerable time it was associated with the journalistic profession. The easterly side of Fourteenth Street, between F Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, was formerly known as Newspaper Row. The building on this corner was used by newspapermen from shortly after the Civil War until the early seventies, when it was torn down to make room for the famous Ebbitt House. In that hotel lived many eminent men who reached national prominence during the succeeding generation. That old house and some of its neighbors gave way to provide the location for this magnificent building. It has a frontage of 270 feet on F Street and 150 feet on Fourteenth Street, and occupies nearly a whole acre. The corner stone was laid in the spring of 1926, and this great structure of composition limestone, steel, and concrete, as near fireproof as possible, rising 14 stores, was completed late last year. It has a large moving-picture theater and there are stores and offices around the auditorium and the stage.

In the rest of the property there are located 1,000 individual office units. Already more than 400 newspapers are represented in this building, although some of the correspondents are connected with more than one publication. The National Press Club occupies the larger part of the thirteenth and all of the fourteenth floors, giving it a floor space of 27,000 square feet. The club has a large auditorium, with a seating capacity of close to 1,000, spacious dining rooms, and a library capable of holding 5,000 books. The other facilities are such as are characteristic of a first-class club.

In is hoped by the management that this property, valued at about $10,000,000, may be free from incumbrances within 25 years. Its income will then be devoted to the benefit of the National Press Club, which will be in possession of more than $500,000 of income each year. It is planned to give awards for journalistic achievement and use the surplus profits of the property for the promotion of the general welfare of the newspaper business. The journalistic profession as it is represented in the city of Washington lends itself especially to a movement of this kind. Like everything else connected with the Government of the United States, it has had a very remarkable growth.

It is said that it was not until 1796 that any newspaper was published here. After struggling along a little more than a year with his semiweekly, Benjamin More, a bookseller, who was the proprietor of the enterprise, announced: "The Washington Gazette will not be published again until the publication is attended by some profit to the publisher." In October of 1800 a triweekly, called the National Intelligencer, was started, and 13 years later became a daily. Ever since that time the disputes between certain Members of the Congress and those reporting its proceedings have been chronic. The Evening Star was founded in 1852 and the Washington Post in 1877. The Herald, Times, and News are of much more recent date.

But this organization exists not so much on account of the local and powerful press of this city as because of the large number of correspondents who are here from all parts of the Nation to report the doings of the Federal Government. This, too, has been a remarkable growth. In 1862 the Senate press gallery listed only 13 correspondents. In that year Whitelaw Reid managed the Washington bureau of one of the New York dailies. It was more the practice in that time for one man to be employed by a number of papers. At the present day there are about 500 correspondents here, connected with the press all over the world. Some of the metropolitan dailies have as many as nine on their local staff.

It is this condition that has made possible the establishment and growth of our National Press Club. An effort was made in this direction as early as 1867 by a social organization made up entirely of local newspaper men, known as the Washington Press Club, which was in existence several years. In 1892 the local newspaper men started the National Capital Press Club, which gave some notable entertainments, but was later disbanded on account of financial difficulties. The present National Press Club dates from 1908. Its purpose was to provide an organization and gathering place in Washington for the benefit of newspaper men throughout the country. It has made steady progress until it has a resident membership of nearly 1,100 and a nonresident membership of 800. In the character and importance of the news which it reports, in the power which it represents, its opportunities surpass those of any other press club in the world.

It is possible to see in this spacious building, so magnificently equipped, a symbol of the development of the whole United States. The old, the outworn, the poorly adapted, has been discarded and removed to make place for the new and the modern. It represents an increase in power, not by any means limitless, but very vast. The process has transformed our Press Club into a great business institution. Something analogous to this has taken place in the journalism of our country. The press itself, by the very force of circumstances, in order to survive has been changed from an organization of partisan and personal opinion into a very great commercial organization. It has become much more important, in fact indispensable, to the business enterprise of the country, but appears to have lost very much of its power as a director of public thought. There are so many other avenues of information that people are much less dependent than formerly upon the press for their knowledge of men and of affairs.

Now, that the transition has been made through various consolidations, and through the elimination of the unsuccessful, the journalism of the United States has on the whole established itself according to the new standards upon a profitable financial basis. It ought to undertake to recapture the dominant position it formerly held as a distributor of current information and a director of public opinion. It ought to contest with our universities as an influence for education and match the pulpit in its support of high moral standards.

In a republic the field which is open to the press as an instrument of clean and sound government is limitless. It ought to be the supporter of efficient local administration and wise national statesmanship. In international affairs it should cooperate with its own government and extend to foreign interests a tolerant and sympathetic candor. Foreign interests have the privilege of being represented here. The right to fair treatment is as wide as humanity. But when foreign governments are represented here their agents are required to come publicly accredited and be publicly received. For generations our law has forbidden our own citizens entering into any negotiations with a foreign government concerning its relations with our own Government. Such negotiations can only be carried on under the direction of the President. Whenever any of the press of our country undertake to exert their influence in behalf of foreign interests, the candor of the situation would be greatly increased if their foreign connections were publicly disclosed. All public business ought to be publicly conducted.

One of the strongest safeguards of the integrity of official action is publicity. This does not mean an espionage of all personal and private action of Government officials, but it does mean publicity concerning the discharge of the duties which they have chosen to perform. All those who have interests which may be affected by governmental action should have the privilege of employing representatives to present their cause and defend their rights. Nobody questions this on the judicial side, but those who are so engaged are required to be licensed and their appearance before such tribunals is a matter of court record. As in the case of the Federal Government those who are analogously employed in legislative and departmental matters are not required to make a like disclosure of the interests which they undertake to serve; it is necessary to depend on the press for such information.

It is, perhaps, stating the obvious to say that the press should be patriotic. This does not require any disparagement of the advantages which other people enjoy in their own country. Whatever it may be in some individual cases, other countries are best adapted to the people as a whole who live there, and our country is certainly the best country for our people. The freedom enjoyed here, the institutions of self-government, the protection of the individual, the standards of living, the comforts and even the luxuries, the unexampled progress in national development, and, in general, equal opportunity, not in any narrow and limited sense but on both the material and spiritual sides of life, broad and unbounded—all these are sufficient to warrant the admiration and reverence of every informed mind.

More progress has been made in this country in scientific development in the last 150 years than had been made in all the world from the day of Julius Cæsar to George Washington. Our successes have not betrayed our judgment or hardened our heart. In spite of sporadic outbreaks of violence, one of our chief characteristics is a profound reverence for humanity. On our record and on our prospects there is every reason for an abiding faith in our country.

While these considerations may well be dwelt upon as justifying pride in our country, the reasons for love of country appear to lie deeper. It can scarcely be said that it is the people of great and powerful nations who have exhibited the greatest attachment to the land of their birth. Those who have originated in countries that were small and inconspicuous and poor have rather been marked by a devotion to the soil which bred them above those who were reared among more affluent circumstances. Nevertheless, it has been that strain, nourished on the sentiment of patriotism, who, when they have been transferred to countries having broader opportunities, have been an important factor in human development. They have exhibited a tenacity of purpose, a strength of character, and a moral fiber that have made them a most important element in any country wherever they have been found. Next to devotion to the home, devotion to the country has been one of the strongest and most indispensable attributes contributing to human progress.

The constant criticism of all things that have to do with our country, with the administration of its public affairs, with the operation of its commercial enterprises, with the conduct of its social life, and the attempt to foment class distinctions and jealousies, weaken and disintegrate the necessary spirit of patriotism. There is always need for criticism, but there is likewise need for discrimination. There is a requirement for justice and truth. Wherever there is the genuine, there will be some counterfeits. But our own Nation, or any other nation, does not consist of the counterfeits; it consists of the genuine. Constantly to portray the failures and the delinquents is grossly to mislead the public. It breeds an unwarranted spirit of cynicism. Life is made up of the successful and the worthy. In any candid representation of current conditions they have the first claim to attention. In the effort of the press to destroy vice, it ought not to neglect virtue.

These are some of the ideals toward which, I believe, the journalistic profession should work. I am conscious that they are not yet attainable in their entirety, and yet they may be closer at hand than many of us realize. As civilization advances the time element of reactions greatly decreases. Reforms do not always grow up gradually. They are likely to occur all at once. It is, rather, abuses that creep in on us with a slow growth. The spirit of mankind is more and more asserting itself, more and more demanding that the affairs of government and society be conducted in accordance with the laws of truth. The people who neglect that precept are bound for a moral explosion. Publicity is not only the main agency of reform, it is likewise the main agency of prevention. In its true function it is not the voice of the individual reporter or editor, but the voice of public expression. It represents the thought, the hope, the aspirations, and the faith of the people.

It is a great opportunity that comes to the members of the National Press Club of Washington. This city is not only the seat of our Federal Government and the political center of our country, but it is bound to become more and more the center of science, of art, and of literature. Because of the position which the United States holds in the world, it will assume increasing importance in international affairs. Because you have places here of great power, you are likewise charged with great responsibilities.

In no small degree you are the keepers of the public conscience. By being servants of the truth you can help to create and support that confidence in our institutions and in each other, which is the foundation of national progress and prosperity. You can give to the nations a better understanding of each other and increase the harmonious relationship, the spirit of good will and friendship, which will bring to all peoples more of the blessings of contentment and of peace.

ARTICLE BY SENATOR BORAH—TREATIES WITH FRANCE, ETC.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, there appeared in yesterday's New York Times an article written by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] discussing suggested treaties with France and other nations. I ask unanimous consent that the article may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ONE GREAT TREATY TO OUTLAW ALL WARS—SENATOR BORAH, IN SUPPORT OF SECRETARY KELLOGG'S ARGUMENTS, ASSERTS THAT SUCH A COMPACT WOULD STRENGTHEN THE PEACE MACHINERY OF THE LEAGUE, AND HE CALLS ON THE POWERS TO ACCEPT OUR PROPOSAL

(Again interest is centered on how to insure world peace. In a series of diplomatic notes the American and French Governments have discussed a sweeping proposal to outlaw war among all the nations. While willing to sign such a treaty with the United States, France points to the commitments of the powers under the league covenant and the Locarno agreements which bind them to take part against a war of aggression. Senator BORAH, chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, takes up the argument where the diplomatic correspondence stopped; he argues that acceptance of the American proposal to outlaw war is not in conflict with the other agreements, but that its acceptance will allow all the peace machinery now in being to function more readily. He appeals to all the great powers to say whether "they are not willing at this time to join in denouncing and outlawing war.")

By WILLIAM E. BORAH, Senator from Idaho

In the month of April, 1927, the Foreign Minister of France, M. Briand, in a public address used the following language:

"France is willing publicly to subscribe with the United States to an engagement tending to outlaw war (to use an American expression) between the two Nations."

This proposal was not made through diplomatic channels but in a public speech and addressed, as it were, to all the world, and all the world heard it. What was said in the balance of his speech we do not know nor has anyone been concerned to find out. This single sentence completely overshadowed all else and distinguishes the speech as one of the most important which has been made by any Foreign Minister since the World War. It has been read and commented upon in every civilized country under the sun. All this reveals what a deep yearning there is among all peoples to be rid of the institution of war. A single step is hailed with universal acclaim.

MR. BRIAND'S FORMAL OFFER

Later M. Briand transmitted to our Government a more formal statement in which it was proposed, in brief, that the two Governments should solemnly declare:

"That they condemn recourse to war and renounce it respectively as an instrument of their national policy toward each other."

On December 28, the Secretary of State, Mr. Kellogg, proposed that the bilateral treaty be extended in its scope and that "an effort be made to obtain the adherence of all the principal powers of the world to a declaration renouncing war as an instrument of national policy." To this the Government of France replied suggesting, first, that France and the United States enter into such a treaty and then submit the same for the consideration of other powers; secondly, that the scope of such a treaty be limited to wars of aggression.

BRIAND'S CONTENTIONS

To this our Government replied urging that better progress could be made by all Governments acting together and rejecting limiting it to wars of aggression. M. Briand replied, in effect agreeing with both propositions, but calling attention to the fact that France and the other leading powers "are wholly bound to one another by the covenant placing them under reciprocal obligations, as well as by agreements such as those signed at Locarno in October, 1925. All of which engagements impose upon them duties which they can not contravene. The French proposal of June last looking to the conclusion of a bilateral compact had been drawn up in the light of century-old relations between France and the United States; the French Government still stands ready to negotiate with the American Government on the same conditions and on the same basis. But when confronted with the initiative of the United States in proposing a multipartite covenant, it had to take into consideration the relations existing among the various powers which would be called upon to participate therein."

Thus in these negotiations looking to treaties between the leading nations of the world renouncing and denouncing war as an instrument of policy we reach the point where it is deemed that such a program conflicts with the covenant of the League of Nations. One of the leading journals of the country defines the situation as follows:

"A more accurate description of this proposal would have been to call it a treaty to renounce the covenant of the League of Nations. For the whole European political system of renouncing war as an instrument of policy, but of pledges to wage war against any nation which disturbs the peace."

In other words, a system which is an alliance to go to war comes in conflict with an alliance not to go to war, and the question is: Can any method be devised by which the alliance not to go to war shall prevail? It seems to me that the difficulty is not insuperable.

It is true that the League of Nations for peace may be transformed overnight into a League of Nations for war. But it is fair to presume that the dominant principle is that of peace, and that the League of Nations would wish to make it unnecessary, if possible, ever to transform itself into a league for war. Its primary purpose, according to its advocates, is peace, and it would seem that a solemn pledge among the leading powers and those powers whose representatives sit as permanent members of the council and whose dominance in the league is supreme never to employ war for the settlement of any of their controversies would tremendously aid and assist the league in being nothing more at any time than a league for peace.

Is there anything which one can conceive so well calculated to advance the cause of peace and to strengthen the league and Locarno as a pledge among the great powers that they will never recognize war as an instrument for the settlement of international disputes and that they will adjust their differences in accordance with the methods provided in the league and Locarno for peaceful adjustment? If the leading powers make this pledge and keep it, there will indeed be little chance of war. If they do not keep it, neither the league nor Locarno have been destroyed.

It seems to me, as Lord Thompson has said: "If war were outlawed, the league would be far more firmly founded than it is to-day. The league is merely machinery for the adjustment of disputes; the proposal to outlaw war is a piece of legislation to revise international law upon the basis of peace."

M. Briand, in his note of January 23, says:

"The French Government still stands ready to negotiate with the American Government on the same conditions and on the same basis. That is, the same conditions and basis as the original proposition—a bilateral treaty. The plain fact is that the bilateral treaty proposed by M. Briand is identical in principle as to war commitments with the multilateral treaty offered by our Secretary of State, Mr. Kellogg. By agreeing in a bilateral treaty never to war with the United States, France could not carry out her obligations to go to war under Articles X and XVI of the covenant if war took place between the United States and any member of the league.

Suppose, in the way of illustration, that war should occur between Japan and the United States and, of course, I select Japan merely in the way of an illustration. Japan is a member of the league. Suppose further that Japan successfully invoked assistance from the league under Articles X and XVI of the covenant. France would be unable to render any military assistance to Japan pursuant to the covenant because she had agreed in a bilateral treaty never to go to war with the United States.

The principle underlying a bilateral treaty is identical with the principle involved in a multilateral treaty. On the other hand, a multilateral treaty, binding all the nations, binding all the leading powers, makes war less likely than a treaty between two nations. If France intends to live up to the strict letter of her obligations under Article X of the covenant, "to respect and preserve the territorial integrity and political independence" of all the members of the league, she could not possibly do so in case the United States got into war with any member of the league.

It will not do to say that a bilateral compact does not violate the league commitments because, forsooth, there is no chance of France and the United States going to war.

To make such a statement as that would be to stamp the original proposition with insincerity. If there is no shadow of danger of war between these two Republics, what is the need of making any treaty whatever renouncing war between them? And as M. Briand made his original offer "as an example to other nations," how can it be an "example" if no other nation can sign the compact or if the United States and France are unwilling to join with them in bringing about such a general compact? Was the two-power compact intended to be not only a close corporation but a closed incident?

As to France's other compacts or alliances, these are all supposed to be in harmony with the principles and provisions of the covenant and to be filed with the league. Let us assume, for example, in the case of Belgium, which has been raised by the French, that France is absolutely obligated under her alliance to come to the relief of Belgium in case of attack. This commitment can be easily protected.

All that is necessary is for the multilateral pact to be signed by Belgium, in which event all the signatories agree not to use war or force in any dispute or matter relating to Belgium. If an attack, nevertheless, is made on Belgium by one of the signatories it would constitute a breach of the multilateral treaty and would thereby, ipso facto, release France and enable her to fulfill her military engagements with Belgium. In other words, France's commitment to Belgium would merely be in suspense so long as the signatories kept their multilateral compact; there would be no violation thereof.

Secretary Kellogg very wisely put into his counter proposal not only that there should be a multilateral treaty comprising the big powers, but that it should be "open to the signatures of all nations." The logical development of this idea would lead to the great result desired by Secretary Kellogg, namely, the general renunciation and outlawing of war as a method of settling disputes by all the nations. Would not such a treaty augment and strengthen beyond any words to describe not only every peace plan in the world, but the peace sentiment and the peace public opinion which are just as essential in the cause of peace as treaties?

Such a universal treaty would put an end to any questions of war commitments under the league covenants or other alliances because the occasion for their exercise could only arise in case of a flagrant breach of the treaty by one or more signatories and, as stated, the legal effects of such a breach would be to free France from alleged restraints. And was this not M. Briand's purpose in proposing the pact "as an example to other nations"?

There is an atmosphere of fatality encompassing all discussions by Governments relative to war. "War is inevitable," "Force alone is respected," "Wars have always happened and always will happen."

These are the views, expressed or implied, of governments in dealing with war. We take all kinds of risks for war, but we are unwilling to take risks for peace. We build readily on the hatreds of people and their passion for war. We build reluctantly on the love of people and their passion for peace. It has been often declared that the United States has not cooperated with foreign countries in the advancement of the cause of peace. It is safe to prophesy that the United States will never become identified or cooperate with a system for peace based upon "pledges to wage war."

But the United States now stands ready to cooperate and identify itself with a system based upon pledges not to wage war. It ought to be worth much to have the full cooperation of the United States with the great nations and small nations also, if they choose to come in (and they will hasten, in my judgment to do so), to denounce and outlaw war forever as an instrument of policy.

NETWORK OF TREATIES

At the present time we have a network of treaties and understandings relative to peace—arbitration treaties, conciliation treaties, the Hague Tribunal, World Court, peace machinery of the league, and the machinery of Locarno. The effect of the Kellogg proposal is a solemn pledge to let that peace machinery work. It is a solemn pledge to rely upon the peace machinery of the peace plans and not upon the war machinery. It is a solemn pledge among the leading nations that they will not resort to war, that they are forever pledged to the employment of peaceful methods for the adjustment of their controversies. This gives us international laws based upon peace and not upon war. This pledge strengthens every piece of peace machinery in existence.

It is my opinion that it is not within the ingenuity of the human brain to set up and maintain a successful plan for world peace in competition with the conceded legitimacy of war as an instrument for the settlement of international disputes.

THE RESPONSIBILITY OF PEACE

The problem of peace or war for a long time to come is in the keeping and determination of a group of leading powers. If war comes, it will be because they, or some of them, will it so. The United States, Great Britain, Germany, France, Japan, Italy, and Russia will determine international law, international morality, and shape the course of peace to a controlling degree for many years. If they can adjust their controversies through peaceful methods and throw their influence against war as an instrument of policy, there is but little danger of war being fomented in other sources.

These nations can not escape their responsibilities—the dreaded responsibility for war should war come. They have it within their power so to adjust things as to practically outlaw war. I should like to have an expression from these powers as to whether under these conditions and under this responsibility and in view of their dominance they are not willing at this time to join in denouncing and outlawing war.

I said that they will determine international morality. I had reference in particular to the treatment of small nations and of weak peoples at the hands of the great powers. I do not know of anything in recorded history equal in harshness, in duplicity, and injustice to the treatment of small nations by the great powers since the World War. During that struggle the most solemn and specific pledges were made to small nations and the more dependent peoples. Many were drawn in or led into the conflict against their own immediate interests on these pledges.

POLICY OF BIG POWERS

The "rights of small nations," "respect for sovereignty," "self-government," the "right to live their own lives" became a refrain of the powerful toward the weak and took form not only in general declarations but in specific pledges and agreements. Since the signing of the armistice, even at Versailles a policy wholly and cruelly at variance with these promises and preachments has obtained. From Syria to Nicaragua, from Egypt to China, it is one story of violated agreements and broken pledges, of rights denied and sovereignty invaded. It is one story of impatience and intolerance toward peoples struggling for unity and independence.

Whether there shall be a more just and humane policy toward small nations and weak peoples as well as whether we shall renounce war, await upon the bold and just initiative of the great powers. Whether we shall still cling to war as the basis of national power and the peak of national glory, whether we shall initiate an armaments race, thus burdening our people even more heavily with taxes, await upon the brave and righteous action of these great nations.

If we are going to be rid of some of the vicious beliefs and brutal commitments of the past, we will have to break to some extent with the past. Nothing of great moment was ever achieved by those who cautiously consult and slavishly follow precedents. "The situation must be viewed by every nation and generation boldly through its own eyes, not timorously with the forefinger in the guidebook of history."

LAKE CHAMPLAIN BRIDGES

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, there are on the calendar two bridge measures affecting my State, being Orders of Business 207 and 216. I ask unanimous consent that those measures may be now considered.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, we are going to have the calendar considered this morning until 2 o'clock. I therefore hope the Senator from New York will not make that request.

Mr. COPELAND. This is the second time within a week that the Senator from Kansas has asked me to defer requesting action on these measures. We have passed this morning several bridge bills which are similar to the measures for which I now ask consideration.

Mr. CURTIS. The bills passed this morning were bills which were reported from the Committee on Commerce, and it is usual to take such action in those cases. Under the rule we will have the consideration of the calendar to-day until 2 o'clock, but if we shall take up bills in this way out of order, of course, it will delay the consideration of the calendar. However, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator from Kansas. I first ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Joint Resolution 104.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 104) granting consent of Congress to an agreement or compact entered into between the State of New York and the State of Vermont for the creation of the Lake Champlain Bridge Commission, and to construct, maintain, and operate a highway bridge across Lake Champlain.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COPELAND. I now ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House bill 6099.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6099) granting the consent of Congress to the States of New York and Vermont to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Lake Champlain between Crown Point, N. Y., and Chimney Point, Vt., which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in section 4, on page 3, line 5, before the word "years," to strike out "twenty" and insert "thirty," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. In fixing the rates of toll to be charged for the use of such bridge the same shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the cost of such bridge and its approaches as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 30 years from the completion thereof. After a sinking fund sufficient to pay the cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches shall have been provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper care, repair, maintenance, and operation of the bridge and its approaches. An accurate record of the cost of the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for operating, repairing, and maintaining the same, and of the daily tolls collected, shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

INVESTIGATION OF PUBLIC UTILITY CORPORATIONS

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, on February 1, calendar day of February 2, there was reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce Senate Resolution 83, relating to public utilities. I should like the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce [Mr. WATSON] in order to ascertain if we can not make some arrangement to consider the resolution at an early day.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I reported the resolution the day after I was ordered to do so by the committee. My understanding is that it now has to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I did not ask that it be sent to that committee, because I was not sponsoring the measure. I supposed the Senator from Montana would do that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I move that Senate Resolution 83 be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL TERMS

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no additional concurrent or other resolutions, resolutions coming over from a preceding day are in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in view of the fact that this is Calendar Monday, and that there is a desire on the part of many Senators to proceed with the calendar, I ask unanimous consent that Senate Resolution 128 may go over without prejudice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The morning business is closed.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. HOWELL. I ask unanimous consent for permission to enter a motion for a reconsideration of the votes whereby the Interior Department appropriation bill was ordered to a third reading and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the motion will be entered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did not hear the request of the Senator from Nebraska.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator entered a motion for reconsideration of the votes whereby the Interior Department appropriation bill was ordered to a third reading and passed.

Mr. WILLIS subsequently said: Mr. President, I wonder if we can not have some understanding in regard to the motion that has been made by the Senator from Nebraska. Some of us are very greatly interested in that bill, and want it to be finally acted upon. When is it the purpose of the Senator to call up his motion for determination?

Mr. HOWELL. It is my purpose to call it up to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. WILLIS. Will that be agreeable to the Senator from Utah, who has charge of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. It is agreeable to me if I can get out of a conference that I have on another bill.

Mr. HOWELL. I shall be perfectly willing to call it up Wednesday.

Mr. SMOOT. I should prefer to take it up to-day.

Mr. HOWELL. I am not prepared to take it up to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I want it to come up the first thing to-morrow morning, if the Senator will be ready then.

Mr. WILLIS. Let it be understood, then, that the motion will come up the first thing to-morrow, as soon as the Senator can get the floor.

Mr. HOWELL. I shall be prepared to take it up to-morrow afternoon.

THE CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that in the consideration of the calendar this morning only unobjected bills be considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will state the first bill on the calendar.

PAY OF RETIRED WARRANT OFFICERS

The first business on the calendar was the bill (S. 1946) relative to the pay of certain retired warrant officers and enlisted men and warrant officers and enlisted men of the reserve forces of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and the Coast Guard, fixed under the terms of the Panama Canal act, as amended.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from Utah will withhold his objection. In two minutes I think I can satisfy his views in this matter, because I did it a year ago when the bill was passed. Will the Senator withhold his objection at least until I can make a statement?

Mr. KING. This is a bill that will require a great deal of debate.

Mr. EDGE. I think the Senator is in error as to the bill. We passed the bill at the last part of last session, with the approval of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I will withhold the objection.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senate for a moment, this is a bill which applies alone to the Panama Canal Zone. It affects, I am told, 10 former enlisted men in the Army and 1 or 2 men who, I think, were perhaps in the Navy as warrant officers. It does not affect at all any former commissioned officers. It provides, in a few words, that they will be permitted to retain whatever extra pay or bonus they earn as members of the Army; and it simply restores the situation which had existed for a long time back, until a decision was made recently by the Comptroller General. If I may read just a paragraph from the letter from the Secretary of War, it will perhaps make it plainer than I could make it by an explanation:

In a decision to the Governor of the Panama Canal of December 3, 1924, the Comptroller General held that, notwithstanding the general provisions of that act, the Panama Canal act still requires the Panama Canal to deduct from the compensation paid retired enlisted men employed by it the amount of any retired pay received by them. Under this ruling the Panama Canal appears to be the only branch of the Government service that is not authorized to employ and pay retired enlisted men without deduction from their civilian salaries on account of their retired pay.

In other words, it does not apply to any other branch of the Government service. It just happens to be the case under the Panama Canal act that the Comptroller General made what might be deemed an arbitrary decision, so that we deny a few dollars to these 10 men who were formerly enlisted in the Army or the Navy and employed in the Canal Zone, and are kept there now because of their technical experience. If they were in Government service elsewhere, or anywhere in private service, they would, of course, receive this additional compensation. We passed the bill last year just before the Senate adjourned, and the House did not have time to act on it; so, under the circumstances, I trust the Senator from Utah will withdraw his objection.

Mr. KING. I shall withdraw the objection, but I desire to make this observation:

I believe that the policy of paying officers or employees compensation by the Government upon the theory that they are disabled, and then permitting them to be employed by the Government in other departments at the same rates of pay that are permitted to other employees, is not a very wise one. We pass a retirement bill upon the theory that men are disqualified, in part at least, for the discharge of their duties. We then turn around and hire them, giving them the same compensation that persons obtain who are not so disqualified in part. I do not think the policy is wise, but I shall not object to the consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4 of the Panama Canal act, as amended, shall not be construed as requiring the deduction of the retired pay or allowances of any retired warrant officer or enlisted man of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard, or the training pay, retainer pay, or allowances of any warrant officer or enlisted man of the reserve forces of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard, from the amount of the salary or compensation provided by or fixed under the terms of the Panama Canal act, as amended.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REFUND OF TAXES

The bill (S. 2185) to extend the time for the refunding of taxes erroneously collected from certain estates was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts subsequently said: Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin objected to the consideration of Senate bill 2185. I sent word to him asking him not to leave the Chamber, but I see he has left the Chamber. I should like to reserve the right to call up the bill later when he returns.

CHARLES H. NIEHAUS

The bill (S. 380) for the relief of Charles H. Niehaus was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $33,121 to Charles N. Niehaus, of Grantwood, N. J., to compensate the said Niehaus for losses suffered by him in the designing and erection by the said Niehaus of the Francis Scott Key Memorial at Fort McHenry, Baltimore, Md., under his contract with the United States, dated October 19, 1916, said memorial having been completed by the said Niehaus and accepted by the United States June 14, 1922.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to have some explanation of that bill.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I shall be very glad to give the Senator a brief explanation.

The bill also was passed at the last session. It is a compromise provided by the Committee on Claims of a claim filed by Mr. Niehaus, who was the architect for the Francis Scott Key memorial erected in Baltimore. The report which accompanies the bill, and from which I shall not take the time of the Senate to read more than one extract, plainly assumes on behalf of the Government the responsibility for the extra charge. The plans for the monument as well as the location of the monument were all changed after the estimates and contract had been made; and this brief extract, which is from the War Department, I think will be sufficient:

It was not until October, 1920, that the War Department was ready to go ahead, and he finished the memorial in 1922 at a great loss.

Understand, it was held up for two or three years during the war, for which, of course, the architect would be in no way responsible.

This loss was due partly to changes which he agreed to make in the original design, partly to changes in the location of the memorial, partly to trouble with subcontractors who tried to back down on the contracts, and partly to the greatly increased cost of labor and materials between 1915 when the sculptor figured on the work and 1922 when it was finally completed and accepted.

I might say that last year the subcommittee of the Committee on Claims had a very exhaustive inquiry and hearing, and had all of the bills submitted audited and checked up. This final compromise of $33,121 is, as I recall, about two-thirds of the original claim, which claim was proven by actual account. It is the unanimous report of the committee.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VAN DORN IRON WORKS CO.

The bill (S. 624) for the relief of the Van Dorn Iron Works Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio, who introduced the bill, a question. It appears that this bill is to reimburse a contractor or a subcontractor for package boxes furnished the Post Office Department. The report of the committee shows that the boxes were received and used by that department. How does it happen that they were not paid for by the department?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I was just seeking to get the floor to make a statement on that point. I think the question is a perfectly proper one; and it is similar to the question that was raised by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] when we reached the bill before. I understood that it was perfectly clear that no one else had been paid for these boxes, but when my attention was drawn to it I was not able to give definite information upon the point. I wrote to the Post Office Department officially, and received a letter from the Postmaster General; and I want to say that the letter is not satisfactory to me, and I do not desire to have the bill acted upon until I get some further information.

I therefore ask that the bill be passed by without prejudice.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Before the bill is passed by I want to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to a statement by the Acting Postmaster General under date of October 15, 1919:

Attention should be called to the fact that in a similar case growing out of the fraudulent conduct of the same public officials a special act was passed by Congress on June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. 656), authorizing the payment of the manufacturer's price of $18,227.40 to the Adrian Brick & Tile Machine Co., which was the manufacturer of the boxes furnished through the Michigan Steel Box Co., whose contract, by reason of fraud, was found to be void by the Court of Claims (49 Court of Claims Reports 421), the latter company having made an agreement consenting to the payment of that sum direct to the manufacturer with the understanding that it was not to be regarded as a payment of its claim beyond that sum.

The implication there is that there was fraudulent conduct on the part of public officials; but it does not appear as to what the conduct consisted of, nor what officials were guilty of such conduct.

Mr. WILLIS. I think the question of the Senator is a proper one; and I have written to the people interested in this bill that there must be definite information, that matter will have to be cleared up, before the Senate will be asked to pass upon it; so I ask that the bill be passed over until we get that information.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator has asked to have the bill go over. I hope it will be very clearly shown why this subcontractor can not hold his contractor. I will say frankly that I have a bill here for the relief of subcontractors where the Government apparently got the full benefit of the subcontractor's work and expenditure, but the report comes down that there is no obligation at all between the Government and the subcontractor, that this contract was with the contractor, and therefore they do not recommend any payment.

Mr. WILLIS. I merely wish to add that the letter which came to me from the Post Office Department was astonishing in the amount of information which it did not convey. To clear up the matter it quoted from the report which we already have here. It does not throw any light at all on the subject; and I have notified the parties that unless they can give us information that is conclusive upon this point the Senate will not pass on the bill at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ISABELLE R. DAMRON

The bill (S. 1361) for the relief of Isabelle R. Damron, postmaster at Clintwood, Va., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$695.03" and insert "$439.98," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Isabelle R. Damron, postmaster at Clintwood, Va., the sum of $439.98, the same being the amount of money stolen from the safe in the post office at Clintwood, Va., on July 25, 1923, by persons unknown.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire an explanation before I consent to the passage of this bill. I call the attention of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] to the report of the inspector, who states that the claimant violated the rules, if not the law, relating to postmasters, and says that the loss resulted from negligence within the meaning of the statute; and therefore the Post Office Department reports adversely upon the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, in cases such as this, where there is no question of negligence, credit is allowed postmasters in their settlements. The inspector did not allow credit for this loss when settlement was made. So a bill was introduced, with a view to taking evidence as to whether the negligence, great or slight, was sufficient to justify denying the credit of the $429.

I think the only reason for not allowing the credit was that the drawer in which the money was kept was not sufficiently secured when the burglar entered the building. There is abundant evidence to show that there was no negligence on the part of the postmaster. The money was in a drawer in the post office, which, I think, was entered about 1 o'clock at night——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. SWANSON. The Postmaster General made no recommendation pro or con.

Mr. KING. Mr. New states in his report:

It is further shown that the burglary occurred between 12 noon and 1 p. m., while the office was closed temporarily and unoccupied, and that the funds and stamps were taken from a cash drawer and from the safe, both of which were left unlocked, contrary to the following regulations:

"1. Postmasters must exercise all possible care for the protection of the public funds and property in their custody.

"2. When funds or postage stamps are left at night in offices unprovided with iron safes, they must be kept in strong drawers or other fixed receptacles, which must be securely fastened with good locks. The doors and windows of the office should be made as secure as possible. The same precautions shall be taken when the post office is closed temporarily during the day."

The loss thus appearing to have resulted from negligence within the meaning of the statute above cited, settlement of the claim was made by disallowances under date of January 31, 1924.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, as I said, if there had not been evidence of slight negligence, the inspectors would have allowed this loss in settling the account. There is hardly a session of Congress when we do not appropriate for innumerable claims like this, where there is no negligence. In this case the store was closed about 12 o'clock, as they do in these little country towns, to enable this lady to go home and get her lunch. She did not have a clerk, she was poor, and she closed the office, and while she was away the burglar entered. These stamps were all in the drawer and they were taken out. There is no dispute that they were stolen, and the only technical reason why credit was not allowed was that she did not have a sufficiently strong lock, or a lock which met the rigid requirements of the law. If such had been the case, there would have been no question about the claim being allowed. The Postmaster General made no recommendation against it. He sent it here with a statement of the facts. A great deal of testimony was taken, and at the last session of Congress a bill similar to this bill was reported and passed by the Senate. I hope the Senator will not object.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let me call the Senator's attention to this again:

The funds and stamps were taken from a cash drawer and from the safe, both of which were left unlocked.

Mr. SWANSON. I have stated that they were unlocked. If they had been locked securely——

Mr. KING. No; not securely; they were not locked at all.

Mr. SWANSON. The Postmaster General can not make these allowances unless certain conditions are complied with. The Postmaster General disallowed this, and the claimant came to Congress. She has witnesses here to prove that there was no negligence on her part. She was the postmaster, and postmasters get little pay. A similar bill was passed at the last session of Congress. I think it was debated, if I am not mistaken, one night, and finally passed, and I hope the Senator will not object to the appropriation of this $429.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall put the responsibility on the Senate. I shall not object to the consideration of the bill, but I shall certainly oppose its passage and vote against its passage.

I want to invite the attention of Senators to the fact that if the Government is not to be protected by proper methods when it promulgates proper regulations; if, when employees violate the rules prescribed, as was done in this case, they may come to Congress and receive compensation, then obviously there is no use in promulgating rules and regulations. We have thousands of employees of the Government who have funds in their possession, large funds and small funds, and the Government can not be present by its inspectors constantly. It must provide rules and regulations, and they must be observed, for the protection of property committed to Government employees; and if Government employees violate the Government rules and regulations, which are very clear, it seems to me Congress should not be called upon to pay. If it accedes, there is an invitation to negligence; we will have thousands of these claims, and appeals will be made by eloquent Senators, and the appeals are very strong in many instances; but the result will be a lessening of the morale, a letting down of the bars and the requirement that the Government shall be called upon to pay because of the negligence of its own employees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no further amendment to be offered, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF GEORGE B. SPEARIN

The bill (S. 1678) for the relief of the estate of George B. Spearin, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRATTON. Let that go over.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection just a moment so that I may make a brief explanation?

Mr. BRATTON. Certainly.

Mr. EDGE. A similar bill was passed here in the closing hours of the last session, and it seems to me to be a very just claim. It is to pay interest owing to the estate of George B. Spearin, who successfully prosecuted a claim before the Court of Claims, which was afterwards, as I understand it, affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, but because of some neglect——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator has approached the very point which I think makes this claim questionable. The report shows that the claimant's attorney failed to file the transcript of the judgment of the Court of Claims with the Treasury Department within the period prescribed by law, and that, through the fault or negligence of the claimant's attorney, which, of course, is attributable to the claimant himself, the claim could not be paid.

I am always willing to have the Government right wrongs which have occurred through the negligence of Government officials, or through improper conduct of adversary parties, but it is going a very long way, I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey, to guarantee a claimant against the negligence or failure of his own attorney. There might have been some reason——

Mr. EDGE. There is a reason.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Sounding in the interest of the claim why this transcript was not filed in due time, but I doubt whether Congress ought to commit itself to the precedent of making whole claimants where their losses have accrued through their own negligence, or through the negligence of their attorneys.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I agree absolutely with the Senator from Arkansas in the general principle he has enunciated, that if it is negligence which could have been avoided, then the claim should not be allowed. My information is—and this appears in the report—that the attorney was physically unable to file the transcript. The report reads:

> It also appears that failure to file the transcript of said judgment of the Court of Claims in the Treasury Department as of the date of the judgment of said court, April 13, 1916, was due to the physical condition of the attorney of said Spearin as shown by the affidavit of Dr. Sterling Ruffin, a practicing physician in the city of Washington.

So it would seem that in this case the claimant was entirely an innocent party to the unfortunate result.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I note that in another part of the report, namely, at the end of paragraph 1, the statement is:

> Spearin having died, his executor appealed to Congress, stating that the neglect to file the transcript was a failure to comply with a technical requirement due to the mental condition of the attorney.

Mr. EDGE. Yes; if I may read a little further, I will do so; I did not want to take the time of the Senate. The report further states:

> It also appears that failure to file the transcript of said judgment of the Court of Claims in the Treasury Department as of the date of the judgment of said court, April 13, 1916, was due to the physical condition of the attorney of said Spearin as shown by the affidavit of Dr. Sterling Ruffin, a practicing physician in the city of Washington, from which affidavit it appears that said attorney was suffering from a condition of senile dementia which profoundly affected his memory and faculties and ability to fully protect his client's interests with respect to this technicality.

I think that under those conditions and circumstances the poor claimant certainly is entitled to have the claim paid.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico maintain his objection?

Mr. BRATTON. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

WILLIAM HENSLEY

The bill (S. 1623) for the relief of William Hensley was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to William Hensley, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,500, in full payment for injuries sustained by him while in the discharge of his duties at the navy yard, Washington, resulting in the loss of three fingers of his right hand, loss of his left eye, and other injuries incurred by him in the line of duty.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROTECTION OF WATERSHEDS

The bill (S. 1181) authorizing an appropriation to be expended under the provisions of section 7 of the act of March 1, 1911, entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers," as amended was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill being the unfinished business, will be passed over.

BROOKSVILLE PLANT INTRODUCTION GARDEN

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 20) authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to dispose of real property located in Hernando County, Fla., known as the Brooksville Plant Introduction Garden, no longer required for plant-introduction purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, there is nothing in the report to indicate the value of this property, and nothing to show how valuable it is. I think we ought to have some information as to the value of this property. There might be an appraisement or some investigation as to how it is to be sold.

Mr. McNARY. Let me understand. Does the Senator want a statement from the Secretary of Agriculture as to the probable present value of the property?

Mr. JONES. I think we ought to have something of the kind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over under objection by the Senator from Washington.

NEAT CATTLE

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 21) to correct section 6 of the act of August 30, 1890, as amended by section 2 of the act of June 28, 1926, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon kindly explain this measure?

Mr. McNARY. Yes; I can do that in a word. When the law was enacted the word "neat" by mistake was spelled "meat," which destroyed the meaning. The word "neat" has a technical meaning, namely, it means bovine. The purpose of the act was to prevent the importation of infected animals from Mexico into the United States. The statute was drawn incorrectly, including the word "meat." It is impossible to determine what meat is infected, but it is possible to tell what kind of animals are infected. This is simply for the purpose of making the statute conform with the original intention of Congress.

Mr. KING. It expands the statute in no other direction?

Mr. McNARY. None whatsoever.

The joint resolution had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with an amendment, on page 1, line 5, to strike out "(Public, No. 436, Sixty-ninth Congress)," and to insert in lieu thereof "(44 Stat. L. 775)," so as to make the joint resolution read:

> Resolved, etc., That section 6 of the act of August 30, 1890 (26 Stat. L. 414), as amended by section 2 of the act of June 28, 1926 (44 Stat. L. 775), down to the word "Provided" in line 4 thereof, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the word "meat" and the comma thereafter, in the first line, and the word "importation," in the fourth line, and by substituting in lieu thereof the words "neat" and "exportation," respectively, so that so much of said section as is hereby amended shall read as follows:
> "That the importation of neat cattle, sheep, and other ruminants, and swine, which are diseased or infected with any disease, or which shall have been exposed to such infection within 60 days next before their exportation, is hereby prohibited."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAMING OF CERTAIN HIGHWAYS

The bill (S. 1182) to provide for the naming of certain highways through State and Federal cooperation, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, a few days ago I received a suggestion with reference to the amendment of a bill something like this bill. I do not know whether this is the bill or not, but I have offered an amendment and have it lying on the table. I will ask that this go over until I can look the matter up. I have no objection to this bill.

Mr. McNARY. Let me ask the Senator from Washington the nature of his objection.

Mr. JONES. As I stated, I had a suggestion from the highway commissioner of the State of Washington a few days ago which I think referred to this bill, although I am not sure. I wanted to have an opportunity to look the matter up. I have no objection to this bill myself, but my correspondence suggested an amendment with reference to cooperation in putting up signs along the highways.

Mr. BLAINE. I am opposed to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over under the objection of the Senator from Washington.

SALE OF MOUNT WEATHER

The bill (S. 1531) authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to sell the Weather Bureau station known as Mount Weather, in the counties of Loudoun and Clarke, in the State of Virginia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to advertise for sale and to sell to the highest responsible bidder the premises known as Mount Weather, in the counties of Loudoun and Clarke, in the State of Virginia, and comprising 84.81 acres of land, more or less, together with the buildings and other improvements thereon, including laboratories, cottages, sheds, stables, shops, heating and power plant, kite shelter, and other buildings of whatever nature, together with all rights, easements, and appurtenances thereto belonging, at such time, in such manner, and upon such terms as he may deem for the best interests of the United States; to convey such property to the purchaser thereof by the usual quitclaim deed, and to deposit the proceeds of such sale in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt, after deducting the expenses incident to such sale, but the Secretary of Agriculture shall reserve the right to reject any and all bids if in his judgment it is in the public interest to do so; and in the event of a general rejection of bids, to readvertise the property under conditions provided herein as often as may be necessary to accomplish sale.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSIONS OF TIME UNDER OIL AND GAS PERMITS

The bill (S. 1155) to grant extensions of time under oil and gas permits was announced as next in order.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, some Senators have amendments they desire to propose to this bill, and I will ask that it go over until the amendments may be ready.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

HORACE A. CHOUMARD

The bill (S. 511) to reimburse Horace A. Choumard, chaplain in Twenty-third Infantry, for loss of certain personal property was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRATTON. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

WILLIAM MORTESEN

The bill (S. 1219) for the relief of William Mortesen was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "$20,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to William Mortesen the sum of $1,000 for assistance rendered to the United States Government in land cases in Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALBERT WOOD

The bill (S. 1217) for the relief of Albert Wood was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a similar bill was reported favorably at the last session of Congress and passed by the Senate. It is a situation wherein Mr. Wood had a contract to deliver mail between two towns in the State of Oregon for a four-year period, and after he had carried into effect his contract for 17 months it was canceled. The bill is to allow him slight damages for cancellation of the contract.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Why was the contract canceled?

Mr. McNARY. Because the department thought they could have a better service in a different way, and changed the route.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Did they have the right under the terms of the contract to cancel it?

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is a mere equitable settlement?

Mr. McNARY. Yes. A similar bill has been reported out and passed by the Senate on two different occasions.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I think the bill is a very just one. After due consideration by the committee it was determined that the beneficiary had suffered a loss for which he really was not to blame. He had to purchase certain equipment and go to some expense. The bill is really only to compensate him for his loss after having had the contract canceled as has been suggested.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 6, page 1, to strike out "$1,475" and insert in lieu thereof "$750," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Albert Wood, of Vernonia, Columbia County, Oreg., the sum of $750 in full compensation for losses suffered by him through and in connection with the cancellation by the Post Office Department in October, 1915, of a contract held by him for carrying the mails on star route No. 73195, in the State of Oregon, from July 1, 1914, to June 30, 1918.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF AIRPLANE ACCIDENT VICTIMS, MOUNDSVILLE, W. VA.

The bill (S. 1164) to provide relief for the victims of the airplane accident at Langin Field, Moundsville, W. Va., was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to pay, in lieu of any other payment now authorized by law, (a) the sum of $5,000 to the personal representative of every person not in the military or naval forces of the United States who was killed or whose death is a direct result of injuries sustained in the airplane accident at Langin Field, Moundsville, W. Va., on July 10, 1921; (b) a reasonable amount, not exceeding $2,000, to every such person who was injured in such accident, as reimbursement for medical, surgical, and hospital attendance, supplies, and expenses, and as compensation for loss of time as a direct result of such injury; (c) a reasonable amount to the owner of any property destroyed or damaged by such accident as compensation for such destruction or damage.

SEC. 2. The amounts to be paid under subdivisions (b) and (c) of section 1 shall be determined after a public hearing by a board of officers appointed by the commanding officer of the nearest aviation post, and approved by the Chief of the Air Service and the Secretary of War.

SEC. 3. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 789) to amend the merchant marine act of 1920, approved June 5, 1920, by insuring the exemption from income taxes during the 10-year period there provided of profits on the sale of certain vessels when the proceeds of such sales are invested in new American vessels approved by the Shipping Board, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] is very much interested in the bill. He was called from the Chamber a moment ago. I ask that it may be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1285) to provide for the further development of agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of the act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, and all acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think I would favor the bill, but there are some amendments to be presented which are not found in the bill itself. I ask that it be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2277) relating to giving false information regarding the commission of crime in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. BLAINE. I understand the bill has gone over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has.

LEONIDAS L. COCHRAN AND ROSALIE COCHRAN BRINK

The bill (S. 2020) for the relief of Leonidas L. Cochran and Rosalie Cochran Brink was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to patent to Leonidas L. Cochran, of St. Andrew, Fla., lots 9 and 13 of section 11, township 4 south, range 15 west, of the Tallahassee meridian, Florida, and to Rosalie Cochran Brink, of St. Andrew, Fla., lots 2 and 3 of section 10, said township: Provided, That the parties named pay for the land described at the rate of $1.25 per acre within six months after the approval hereof.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I would like to ask that the report accompanying the bill just passed be printed in the RECORD. It is a short report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

[S. Rept. No. 78, 70th Cong., 1st sess.]

LEONIDAS L. COCHRAN AND ROSALIE COCHRAN BRINK

Mr. BRATTON, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, submitted the following report to accompany S. 2020:

The Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2020) for the relief of Leonidas L. Cochran and Rosalie Cochran Brink, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass without amendment.

The bill has the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior, as set forth in the following letter, which also sets forth the facts relative to the proposed legislation:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 13, 1928.

Hon. GERALD P. NYE,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands and Surveys,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR NYE: You have requested a report on S. 2020, a bill for the relief of Leonidas L. Cochran and Rosalie Cochran Brink.

The bill proposes to allow Leonidas L. Cochran to acquire title to lots 9 and 13 of section 11, township 4 south, range 15 west, Tallahassee meridian, Florida (39.98 acres), upon payment of $1.25 per acre, and to allow Rosalie Cochran Brink to acquire, on the same terms, lots 2 and 3 of section 10, said township (151.70 acres).

On March 6, 1924, the register of the Gainesville, Fla., land office allowed Leonidas L. Cochran to make an additional homestead entry for lots 4, 7, 8, and 9 of section 11, said township. There had been a resurvey of the township, and in adjusting the claims for the land which had attached under the original survey it was necessary to cancel the entry of Cochran on October 28, 1926, and patent the land to J. H. Drummond. In the meantime Cochran had cleared the entered land and made many improvements thereon, his expenses in connection with the entry being approximately $1,000.

Rosalie Cochran Brink, then unmarried, made homestead entry on September 18, 1925, for lot 4 of section 3 and lots 7, 8, and 10 of section 10, said township, which entry was likewise canceled on October 28, 1926, in the adjustment of conflicting claims revealed by the plat of resurvey, and the land was patented to said Drummond. While the entry was intact, Mrs. Brink erected a six-room house on the land, besides a cow barn and shed and a poultry house, and cleared, fenced, and cultivated between 5 and 6 acres. She estimates her expenditures on the entry at not less than $900.

The cancellation of both said entries was due solely to the fraudulent or erroneous character of the original survey, executed in 1847. To allow the parties to purchase the lots described would be a measure of relief from the losses sustained by the erroneous allowance of the entries referred to, and I recommend that the bill be enacted.

Very truly yours,

HUBERT WORK.

LINCOLN COUNTY, OREG.

The bill (S. 1218) for the relief of Lincoln County, Oreg., was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to Lincoln County, Oreg., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum of money equal to the amount Lincoln County would have received as taxes for the years 1919, 1920, 1921, and 1922 from the United States Spruce Production Corporation if the real and personal property of such corporation, exclusive of improvements made thereon by the United States, United States Spruce Corporation, or any other agent of the United States, were taxable as property privately owned. The sum shall be in full satisfaction of all claims of Lincoln County against the corporation, or any real or personal property thereof, or against the United States in respect of such corporation or property for such taxes for such years.

SEC. 2. For the year 1923 and for each year thereafter, as long as any such property remains the property of the corporation or of the United States, or of any corporation, 51 per cent or more of the shares of which is owned by the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to Lincoln County, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, an amount equal to the amount which would be payable as taxes on such property to Lincoln County if such property were taxable as property privately owned.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRATTON subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to recur to Calendar No. 81, the bill (S. 1218) for the relief of Lincoln County, Oreg.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objecton? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BRATTON. I should like to have an explanation of the bill if the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] will make it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico asks the senior Senator from Oregon to explain the bill.

Mr. BRATTON. Is this the same bill we discussed at some length during the last session?

Mr. MCNARY. It is. A similar bill was passed by the Senate on two different occasions. It came from the Committee on Claims, of which the Senator from New Mexico is a member, as I recall.

Mr. BRATTON. With that statement I am content.

FRED A. KNAUF

The bill (S. 1758) for the relief of Fred A. Knauf was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the accounts of Fred A. Knauf, postmaster at Sheboygan, Wis., in the sum of $141,433.82 (said sum consisting of $107 cash, $76,703.62 salable postage stamps, $64,575.20 precanceled stamps, one war-savings stamp of the value of $5, and war-tax revenue funds to the amount of $43), on account of money, war-savings stamp, and postage stamps stolen from safes in the post office at said city when burglarized on October 17, 1925.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like an explanation of the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I shall be glad to make an explanation for the Senator from Utah. This is a bill to provide for the relief of the postmaster at Sheboygan, Wis. It is to reimburse him in the sum of $141,433.82, which was taken from the post office in a robbery. The matter has been very thoroughly investigated by the Post Office Department and a most comprehensive report of the department is incorporated in the report accompanying the bill, setting forth the fact that all the regulations provided by the department were strictly complied with and that there was no negligence or breach of the regulations by the postmaster. The bill is recommended by the Postmaster General and by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget. The committee also recommends its passage. I believe, from the investigation which I have made of the matter, that the bill should pass in justice to the postmaster.

AMENDMENT OF MERCHANT MARINE ACT, 1920

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, during my temporary absence from the Chamber Calendar No. 75, the bill (S. 789) to amend the merchant marine act of 1920, approved June 5, 1920, by insuring the exemption from income taxes during the 10-year period there provided of profits on the sale of certain vessels when the proceeds of such sales are invested in new American vessels approved by the Shipping Board, was reached and passed over without prejudice. I ask that it may now be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce without amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, when the bill was before the Senate previously it was rather fully explained. The only objection made to it was raised by the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. I have since conferred with him and have a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury covering the very point about which objection was made. The Senator objected because the bill had not been referred to the department. It was subsequently referred, and I have here the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to me and likewise a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Senator from Utah. I ask that both letters, together with the committee report, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters and committee report are as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, January 16, 1928.

Hon. FRANK B. WILLIS,
Chairman Committee on Commerce,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: There is attached a copy of a letter addressed to Senator SMOOT, chairman of the Finance Committee, relative to Senate bill 789.

This department approves the passage of the bill in order to carry out the purpose intended to be accomplished in the original merchant marine act, but has suggested that the bill be amended so that the exemption will be granted if the entire proceeds of the sale shall forthwith be invested in building new ships in American shipyards. The bill, no doubt, contemplates that the investment will be made immediately, but it appears to this department desirable to have the word "forthwith" inserted in the bill, line 4, page 2, just after the word "shall," in order that there may be no doubt on this question.

Sincerely yours,

A. W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

JANUARY 16, 1928.

Hon. REED SMOOT,
Chairman Finance Committee,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Reference is made to Senate bill 789, which proposes to amend the second paragraph of section 23 of the merchant marine act, 1920, approved June 5, 1920.

The provision in the merchant marine act which the Senate bill proposes to amend was clearly intended to provide exemption from income tax of the profit derived from any sale made during the 10-year period beginning June 5, 1920, of American ships built prior to January 1, 1914, provided the entire amount received was reinvested in the building of new ships in American shipyards. As the merchant marine act was passed when the revenue act of 1918 was in force it provided that the profit should be exempted from the taxes imposed by Titles I, II, and III of the revenue act of 1918. Evidently the fact that the revenue act of 1918 might not remain in force for the 10 years did not occur to the persons who drafted the original bill, or else it was overlooked by them. As the exemption was contained in an act other than the revenue act, it was overlooked when revision of the revenue act of 1918 was being considered and the revenue act of 1921 was being drafted. This is likely to happen when a provision affecting the taxation of income is not contained in the revenue act.

It is the opinion of this department that Senate bill 789 should be passed in order to carry out the purpose intended to be accomplished in the original act. It is suggested, however, that the bill be amended by inserting the word "forthwith" in line 4, page 2, just after the word "shall," so that the last clause will read "if the entire proceeds shall forthwith be invested in the building of new ships in American shipyards, such ships to be documented under the laws of the United States and to be of a type approved by the board." This amendment is suggested because it appears from the fourth paragraph of the report of the Committee on Commerce submitting the bill to the Senate and recommending its passage that such committee has the idea that the original act intended to give the owners of ships 10 years within which to make the reinvestment. This department does not so read the original act and would seriously object to any provision which would permit the reinvestment to be put off for any great length of time. If the reinvestment could be put off for a period subsequent to the running of the statute of limitations within which an assessment of tax could be made, the taxpayer might claim exemption, and then when the statute had run change his mind and not reinvest. For this reason it is suggested that the word "forthwith" be inserted.

Sincerely yours,

A. W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

[S. Rept. No. 74, 70th Cong., 1st sess.]

AMEND THE MERCHANT MARINE ACT, 1920

Mr. WILLIS, from the Committee on Commerce, submitted the following report, to accompany S. 789:

The Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 789) to amend the merchant marine act, 1920, approved June 5, 1920, by insuring the exemption from income taxes during the 10-year period there provided of profits on the sale of certain vessels when the proceeds of such sales are invested in new American vessels approved by the Shipping Board, having had the same under consideration, report it back without amendment and recommend its passage.

The necessity for this legislation grows out of a decision by the Internal Revenue Bureau regarding the effect of certain provisions in the merchant marine act of 1920. Section 23 of that act provided, among other things, that during the period of 10 years from the enactment of the law any citizen of the United States who might sell a vessel documented under the laws of the United States and built prior to January 1, 1924, should be exempt from all income tax that would be payable upon the proceeds of such sale under title 1, title 2, and title 3 of the revenue act of 1918 if the entire proceeds of such sale should be invested in the building of new ships in American shipyards; such ships to be documented under the laws of the United States and to be of type approved by the Shipping Board.

It will be observed by the terms above quoted, the exemption was applicable only to income tax payable under the revenue act of 1918. This act was repealed and succeeded by the revenue act of 1921. The Internal Revenue Bureau holds that since the tax from which exemption was given disappeared by that name with the repeal of the 1918 act there is no exemption as to these funds under subsequent acts.

As a result, American citizens who have sold ships and reinvested the proceeds in new ships, with the idea that the original act gave them 10 years within which to make the reinvestment, are now called upon by the present ruling to pay a substantial part of the proceeds of these sales as taxes.

The clear, unmistakable purpose of Congress in enacting the original law was to give for a period of 10 years the advantage which would come from the aforesaid exemption. The purpose of the pending measure is to carry into effect this original purpose set forth in the merchant marine act of 1920.

It is of the greatest importance that our shipping should receive all reasonable and proper encouragement. In spite of all that has been done, the proportion of our commerce carried in American ships is falling off day by day. It is therefore provided that the advantages accruing under the original act shall exist not only under the revenue act of 1918, but under any subsequent revenue act in force during the 10-year period beginning June 5, 1920.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator state the substance of the report of the department on the bill?

Mr. WILLIS. The department suggests that there ought to be inserted one word in line 4, page 2, of the bill—the word "forthwith." As it reads now the language is, "If the entire proceeds thereof shall be invested in the building of new ships."

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BINGHAM in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. I want to ask the Senator a question. Did I correctly understand the Senator to state that the Secretary of the Treasury and some other Federal official have approved the bill?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes. It was referred to the Treasury Department and received the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary's letter will appear in the RECORD. The Secretary suggested, however, and properly, I think, that the following amendment should be made to protect the Treasury. As it reads now, the language is, "if the entire proceeds thereof shall be invested," and so forth. The Secretary thought, and I think he is correct in it, that the word "forthwith" should be inserted. I move, therefore, that in line 4——

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIS. Will the Senator let me finish the statement of the amendment?

Mr. KING. I was desirous of inquiring whether consent has been given for consideration of the bill.

Mr. WILLIS. That has already been given. We have proceeded to consider the bill by unanimous consent.

Mr. KING. Of course, if the Senator with so much assurance says we have agreed to do that, I shall accept his statement.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator was temporarily absent.

Mr. KING. I have not left the Chamber.

Mr. WILLIS. The request was properly put by the Chair, and no objection was made—not by the present occupant of the chair, but by the President pro tempore.

I offer the following amendment. On line 4, page 2, after the word "shall," I move to insert the word "forthwith," so that it will read:

If the entire proceeds thereof shall forthwith be invested in the building of new ships—

And so forth.

Mr. KING. I want to ask why the Senator, when we were considering the so-called shipping bill, a bill which passed this body a few days ago and which was calculated to prevent the development of a privately owned merchant marine, did not offer the amendment then? Some of us were trying to prevent the passage of that measure, which would, in our opinion, delay the development or the creation of a merchant marine, and suggestions were made as to methods by which a merchant marine, to be privately owned and privately operated, could be brought about. Why did not the Senator offer the amendment on that bill?

Mr. WILLIS. There are several reasons for that. In the first place, this was a separate bill already reported from the committee and pending upon the calendar. I myself have never liked the procedure of offering one bill as an amendment to another. It tends to complicate the situation. That is one very good reason.

To be perfectly frank about it, here is another reason. I offered, as an amendment to the bill to which the Senator refers, in which I think I had the support of the Senator himself, to strike out the provision for a unanimous vote required by the terms of the bill and to insert a provision to enable the board to act by a vote of five out of the total membership of seven. That amendment was voted down. The disposition manifested here was to vote down any amendment offered, so I thought it was rather injudicious to bring this matter up at that time. At any rate, the measure is now before us on its own merits.

Mr. KING. The Senator will regard this, of course, as a form of subsidy to those engaged or who may engage in the construction of ships.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator might so denominate it. It is an indirect aid, but I hope the Senator will recall that what I am trying to do is simply to carry into effect the evident purpose of the merchant marine act of 1920. The evident purpose of that act was to give this aid to shipowners for the period of 10 years, beginning in 1920. But the act referred to the income tax law of 1918, and when that was superseded by the act of 1921 of course the department, very properly I think, decided that it does not apply here; so we are simply trying to carry into effect the evident purpose of the act of 1920.

Mr. KING. As an original proposition, or if we had a bill before us for the establishment or development of a merchant marine, I concede that perhaps a measure of this kind might be meritorious. It is possible that with the foreign competition in ocean trade there must be some indirect aid given to privately owned and privately operated ships engaged in that trade. It is possible that one of the indirect aids is to relieve them from taxation, providing the equivalent is to be expended in the construction of ships. Another would be by discriminatory duties. In fact, there are many suggestions which could be made which, in my opinion, would develop a merchant marine. We turned all of those propositions down and elected to have the Government enter upon the construction and operation of ships and to destroy, in my opinion, every possibility or probability of private capital being utilized in the construction of ships for ocean travel. I think the measure of the Senator will prove a nullity if the bill which passed the Senate the other day should receive the approval of the other body and the Executive.

I shall not object to the consideration of the pending bill, but I think I shall be constrained to vote against it.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, when this matter was up in committee I suggested to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], as the Senator from Utah has now suggested, that it is in the nature of a subsidy, but since I am in favor of encouraging a privately owned merchant marine I shall vote for the bill. Of course, no one who voted for the bill which passed the Senate the other day could possibly vote for the bill presented now by the Senator from Ohio, but personally I hope it will prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 4, after the word "shall," insert the word "forthwith," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 23 of the merchant marine act of 1920, approved June 5, 1920, be, and is hereby, amended so that the second paragraph thereof shall read as follows:

"That during the period of 10 years from June 5, 1920, any person, a citizen of the United States, who may sell a vessel documented under the laws of the United States and built prior to January 1, 1914, shall be exempt from all income taxes that would be payable upon any of the proceeds of such sale under the revenue act of 1918, or under any subsequent revenue act in force during such 10-year period, if the entire proceeds thereof shall forthwith be invested in the building of new ships in American shipyards, such ships to be documented under the laws of the United States and to be of a type approved by the board."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF NEWTON, MASS.

The bill (S. 2447) for the relief of the stockholders of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass., was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRATTON. I ask that that bill go over.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I hope the Senator who objected to the consideration of the bill, the title to which has just been read, will withhold the objection so that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], who reported the bill, may explain it. The bill has been unanimously reported favorably by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BRATTON. I withhold the objection so that the Senator from Delaware may explain it.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, this bill provides for payment of interest on a claim which was adjudicated by the Court of Claims. The amount of the claim as determined by the Court of Claims was finally paid, but the interest thereon was never paid. The facts briefly are these: In 1867 the Newton National Bank was engaged in business in Boston, Mass., and at the same time there was a subtreasury located in that city. The official in charge of the Federal subtreasury there abstracted funds on deposit in the subtreasury and used them for his own purposes in the way of speculation. He took with him in this speculative operation other people, including the cashier of the bank in question. The time came when he was out of pocket and could not make good the losses he had sustained upon the market by the use of these Federal funds. He then found out that in a short time an examination would be made by the traveling auditor of the Federal Government, and for the purpose of making good his accounts he called upon his friends in the Newton Bank and in other banks to lend him funds and securities of those banks, including the bank in question, for the purpose of making good his account and showing to the traveling auditor of the Federal Government that his accounts were all square.

He agreed with the cashier of the Newton Bank that the funds obtained from the Newton Bank should be so earmarked that after the examination was held by the Federal auditor those funds would be promptly and at once returned by this rascally Federal employee to the Newton National Bank. Unfortunately, however, when the examination was about to be made, this Federal employee lost his nerve, confessed to his act, and stated that he was guilty of the defalcation. This was done after the funds had been taken from the Newton Bank and placed in the Federal subtreasury. In other words, the Federal Government then became possessed of money stolen through the agency of its own officer, knowing at the time that it was stolen.

Thereafter a claim was made upon the Federal Government. The case was referred to the Court of Claims and was there adjudicated against the Government, and in 1881 or 1882—I have forgotten which—the Federal Government appropriated money to pay the principal of the claim; but no interest was ever paid upon the amount of money utilized by the Government between the years 1867 and 1881 or 1882 when the claim for the principal was paid. This bill is for interest at an average rate of 4½ per cent, which was the amount of interest paid by the Federal Government during the period the Government had these funds. It obtained them through the rascality of one of its own officers; it knew they were stolen at the time it received them; yet it kept using these stolen funds, knowing they were stolen during this period, and did not pay them back until 1881 or 1882.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARAWAY. Did not the Newton National Bank know that the funds had been stolen; and did it not retain the cashier in his position?

Mr. BAYARD. The Newton National Bank was not informed as to this theft until after it was confessed by the Federal employee. The cashier had no power except the physical power to extract these securities and these moneys; that could only be done legally by resolution of the board of directors, and they knew nothing of it until after the transaction had taken place.

Mr. CARAWAY. I should like to ask the Senator another question. As I understand, the man who defaulted was an officer of the Federal Government in the subtreasury; he had embezzled moneys belonging to the Government; he was to be checked up; he knew he was short; and I understood that he went to the Newton National Bank and told them that he wanted to borrow this money and have it to his credit so that he could show that he was not short.

Mr. BAYARD. He did tell the cashier, but the cashier is the only person he told. The cashier then stole the money from the Newton National Bank to help him out, and he did it contrary to the rules and regulations of the national bank; nor did he give any information to any officer of the national bank or have any permission from the national bank so to do.

Mr. CARAWAY. Did he not have charge of the moneys of the national bank? Was he not the officer of that corporation that had the exclusive right of loaning money?

Mr. BAYARD. It does not so appear. He took it contrary to the law. He had the physical power but not the delegated legal power for the purpose of abstracting that money from the bank.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. BRATTON. The cashier of the bank did have knowledge of the entire transaction?

Mr. BAYARD. Unquestionably so.

Mr. BRATTON. And delivered the money and securities into the possession of the agent of the Federal Government for the purpose of carrying out a fraudulent transaction?

Mr. BAYARD. Unquestionably so.

Mr. BRATTON. Under those circumstances, Mr. President, I doubt very much if the Government is liable morally or legally. The whole transaction was fraudulent from the start; and if the bank, acting through one of its executive officers, participated in it with knowledge of the fraud, I am unable to see where any moral responsibility rests upon the Government to aid its coconspirator in the fraud.

Mr. BAYARD. I will answer the Senator by saying that the Government has acknowledged that conspiracy in more ways than one. In the first place the Government, by action of Congress, referred the matter to the Court of Claims, and the Court of Claims found judgment in favor of the bank as against the Federal Government for this amount of money. Furthermore, the Government has paid the flat amount of money which was stolen and received by the Government. The Government has acknowledged the matter, so far as it is concerned, all the way through.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, as I understand the law on the question, it is that the possession of stolen money does not give title to it. The title is always in the lawful owner. The fact that the Government had this money did give it physical possession, but it never did have lawful title to it.

Mr. BAYARD. No; but the Government had the use of it for a period of years; it used it during that period but has never paid interest on it.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from New Mexico has said that, theoretically, the Government should have the right to take title to this money; but, as a matter of law, in any court of the land stolen property does not carry with it title. The man who owns it owns against everybody, and nobody can take it from him.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I suggest in reply to the Senator that where two people have been engaged in a conspiracy to perpetrate a wrong, then no court on earth will relieve either one of them. It is necessary to come into court with clean hands. No one can come here and say, "I have engaged in a conspiracy to defraud the Government; I got caught; I lost money, and I now want it back." That is the case before us.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator will admit, nevertheless, that the party who had the funds was the Government and not an innocent third party. The purchase of stolen property from a "fence," even though bought innocently, does not give a right to the property.

Mr. CARAWAY. But certainly the "fence" can not go into the court and say, "I engaged in a game to try to protect the thief and they took the property away from me, and now I want the Government to pay me because I did not successfully perpetrate my larceny."

Mr. TYDINGS. The stockholders of the bank at Newton were not in that category.

Mr. CARAWAY. Who made that man the cashier of the bank? It must have been the stockholders of the bank.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is all right; but the fact that I may hire a man who steals my horse does not give the man to whom he sells it or gives it the title to it, although he was employed by me.

Mr. CARAWAY. If that is true, all you have got to do is hire a crooked agent, and if he fails to get away with the goods establish the fact of the burglary.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is not a parallel case, because you would not hire an agent knowing he is a crook.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Arkansas that the Court of Claims found it to be a fact that the Federal Government received this money through its own proper officer knowing it was stolen money at the time it received it.

Mr. CARAWAY. If it knew, then you charge the Government with knowledge of its agent, and then excuse the bank and say it is not responsible for its agent.

Mr. BAYARD. No; I do not do that.

Mr. CARAWAY. The cashier represented the bank and the agent of the Government represented the Government and the two perpetrated a larceny and an embezzlement.

Mr. BAYARD. No; because the agent of the bank had no power which authorized him to steal this money or take it in that way.

Mr. CARAWAY. Neither did the agent of the Government.

Mr. BAYARD. But the Government maintained and kept control for nearly 13 years of this money which had been stolen.

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course, it knew that somebody stole this money, but that person then went to somebody else who tried to help him get away with it, who tried to replace it and did replace it, and now the Government is asked to pay on account of a conspiracy to steal entered into between its agent and somebody else's agent.

Mr. BAYARD. Oh no. I want the Government to pay for the use of the money and securities it had during this time. Let me say to the Senator that some of the securities were Federal Government securities bearing interest, and the Government clipped its own coupons and put the proceeds in its own pocket during that period.

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course, it was money to replace money which had been stolen, and the person who supplied it did so with a desire to help defraud the Government.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BAYARD. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I understand that the principal of the money was returned by the Government to the bank?

Mr. BAYARD. It was returned after a finding by the Court of Claims.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Government would not have turned over that money unless it was legally bound to do so. The fact that it did turn over the principal and in the meantime had collected part of the principal in the form of interest which had accrued shows in itself that if they were bound to turn over the principal they were also legally bound to turn over everything they got because of the transaction.

Mr. BAYARD. Unquestionably.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, just a moment. If there were a legal obligation involved, the bank would not be here. They never got a cent because of any legal obligation; they got it by an act of Congress; and Congress does not have to be invoked in the case of legal obligations and does not act through the Committee on Claims when obligations are involved which can be enforced.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator yield for just one more question?

Mr. BAYARD. I yield first to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BRATTON. The obligation here could not be called anything except a moral one, and I am not able to brand it in that manner when it is conceded that it is to carry out a fraudulent conspiracy to which the bank was a party. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

JOHN A. FOX

The bill (S. 1325) for the relief of John A. Fox was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John A. Fox, of Springville, Utah, $786.28 in reimbursement of labor and expenditures made by him upon his stock-raising homestead entry No. 019731, Salt Lake City series, embracing the southwest quarter and east half of section 17 in township 8 south, range 5 east, Salt Lake meridian, Utah, the patent for which was annulled by decree of court for the reason that the land was at the date of entry and patent within a national forest and not subject to entry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PORTER BROS. & BIFFLE

The bill (S. 1476) for the relief of Porter Bros. & Biffle and certain other citizens was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask that the bill be passed over for the present without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

BERT MOORE

The bill (S. 2457) for the relief of Bert Moore was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Bert Moore $5,000, in full settlement of all claims for injuries sustained by reason of being shot and seriously wounded by a military guard at Fort Logan H. Roots on the night of April 23, 1925.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEAM TUG "CHARLES RUNYON"

The bill (S. 2471) for the relief of the owner of the American steam tug Charles Runyon was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I should like to have an explanation of that bill.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the bill whose title was just read and the two bills which follow it on the calendar, being Orders of Business 87, 88, and 89, are similar. They have all been before Congress at least once previously, have been approved by the Senate Committee on Claims, and have passed the Senate at least once. Both Order of Business No. 87 and Order of Business No. 88 were recommended by the Secretary of the Navy, who stated that they ought to be passed; and Order of Business No. 89 had the same recommendation. I think they have all been considered heretofore. They simply propose that the matters which are involved shall be referred to district courts of the United States sitting as admiralty courts.

Mr. KING. Very well; I have no objection to the consideration of the bills.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2471) for the relief of the owner of the American steam tug Charles Runyon. The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the Crew Transportation Corporation, owner of the American steam tug Charles Runyon, and/or the receiver and/or trustee of the said corporation against the United States of America for damages alleged to have been caused by collision between said vessel and the U. S. S. Traffic on or about the 6th day of May, 1919, at or near Pier C, navy yard, Brooklyn, N. Y., may be sued for by the said owner and/or receiver and/or trustee in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of New York, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court: and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the owner of the said American steam tug Charles Runyon, and/or receiver and/or trustee of aforesaid, or against the owner of the said American steam tug Charles Runyon and/or the receiver and/or trustee of said corporation, in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and same measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMERICAN STEAM TUG "W. S. HOLBROOK"

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2516) for the relief of the owners and/or receiver of the American steam tug W. S. Holbrook, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the owners of the American steam tug W. S. Holbrook, and/or the receiver of said property, against the United States of America for damages alleged to have been caused by collision between said vessel and the United States Navy steam tug Pentucket on or about the 1st day of November, 1917, at the navy yard, Brooklyn, N. Y., may be sued for by the said owners and/or receiver in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of New York sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court; and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the owners of the said American steam tug W. S. Holbrook and/or receiver aforesaid, or against the owners of said American steam tug W. S. Holbrook and/or receiver of said vessel in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and same measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BARGE "CONSOLIDATION COASTWISE NO. 10"

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2517) for the relief of the owner of the barge Consolidation Coastwise No. 10, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the owner of barge Consolidation Coastwise No. 10 against the United States of America for damages and loss alleged to have been caused by collision between the said barge and barge Consolidation Coastwise No. 24 when said No. 10 was in tow of the United States Navy steam tug Mohawk, in or near Hampton Roads, Va., on or about the 24th day of October, 1918, may be sued for the said owner of barge Consolidation Coastwise No. 10 in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the owner of barge Consolidation Coastwise No. 10, or against the owner of barge Consolidation Coastwise No. 10 in favor of the United States, with the same powers as if said suit was brought in accordance with the provisions of the suits in admiralty act of March 9, 1920, and said decree or judgment shall be paid as provided in said act: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEWIS C. HOPKINS & CO.

The bill (S. 2316) for the relief of Lewis C. Hopkins & Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation of that bill.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, a bill similar to this was passed at the last session of Congress. It provides for a refund of excess duty as between crude camphor and what is known in the Treasury Department as refined camphor. The Treasury Department checked up the 19 entries very completely and fully and report that the firm is entitled to relief.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to Lewis C. Hopkins & Co., of No. 18 Old Slip, New York, N. Y., $50,522.52, being the amount paid as customs duties on importations of Japanese B B crude camphor, imported during the years 1922 and 1923, customhouse entries for which were liquidated at the rate for refined camphor and not protested within the period provided by law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPHINE DOXEY

The bill (S. 2524) for the relief of Josephine Doxey was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On objection, the bill will be passed over.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah permit me to make an explanation in regard to that bill?

Mr. KING. Yes; I withhold the objection.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The claimant was an employee of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. In 1918 she suffered a severe accident while on duty and was confined to the hospital and on a sick bed for a number of weeks thereafter. She did not, however, comply with the technical requirements in the matter of making application for compensation within the time specified in the law. When she filed the application the Compensation Commission took the position that it had not been filed in time. That was one of the questions which that bureau raised, but the Superintendent of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing urged upon the Compensation Commission that her case was meritorious and that it was one which came within the provisions of the law entitling her to compensation of $50 per month.

Mr. EDGE. Is this bill——

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. EDGE. Also, Mr. President, I notice by the report that the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury recommended compensation.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is correct. A controversy arose then between the Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the Compensation Commission as to whether or not she was entitled to this compensation. The physician representing the Compensation Commission did not agree that she was in the injured and afflicted condition physically that she claimed that she was; and, upon the other hand, the physician representing the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, after thorough examination and after close observation of her case for months and months, said that she had suffered this physical disability, that she needed the aid, and that in all justice she was entitled to the aid; but, of course, the Director of the Compensation Commission had the last say on the question as to whether or not she should receive the compensation.

This matter was brought here on account of that conflict between them. The Treasury Department recommends that she have the compensation. The director of the bureau reports that she is entitled to it, and all the reports coming from the bureau sustain that idea. Of course time will not permit going into all the details; but if anyone will read the statements made by the physician representing the Compensation Commission and the arguments made by him, and then take the statements made by the physician representing the Bureau of Engraving and Printing I think he will reach the conclusion, just as the Claims Committee did, that the claimant is entitled to this compensation and should be placed upon the roll. It is recommended by the Treasury Department and by the Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator, in view of the statement he has made, that I shall not object to a bill that provides for the reopening of the case, and if she has been injured, and the commission shall so find, then that she shall be accorded the compensation to which persons sustaining that character of injury would be entitled; but to fix it irrevocably and apparently for all time seems to me not quite fair to the Government.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I appreciate the position of the Senator, but of course we all know what that means. It means that she would never get anything.

Mr. KING. No; I do not agree to that.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I want to appeal to the Senator. I think justice merits that this poor woman, who suffered this injury while on duty, should be compensated as the bill provides.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator please tell me how she got hurt?

Mr. TRAMMELL. She was on night duty, and about 6.30 that night she went into the cafeteria where they are served at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and because of the fact that they had been mopping or scouring the floors there, or something of the kind——

Mr. KING. Some coffee had been spilled upon the floor and she stepped on it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Yes; something of the kind—on account of the condition of this tiled floor she fell and sustained very severe injuries, so the doctor representing the Bureau of Engraving and Printing states.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? The commission held that she was not in the discharge of her duty, did they?

Mr. TRAMMELL. No; they did not hold that she was not in the discharge of her duty, or anything of the kind. They raised the point that she had not filed her application according to the regulations within a certain time. That is one point.

Mr. CARAWAY. But that has been gotten over.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Then, later, a controversy arose as to whether or not she had suffered physical disability. The physician representing the Compensation Commission rather took the position that she had not, and went on to talk about other previous ailments that she had suffered, and this and that and the other. On the other hand, the physician representing the Bureau of Engraving and Printing diagnosed the case as being one where the accident brought about the injuries of which she complained and the condition upon which she claimed that she was entitled to compensation.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am just trying to call the Senator's attention to this statement, which comes from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury:

> The records appear to establish the fact that Mrs. Doxey was injured as a result of a fall on September 11, 1918. The medical evidence submitted in the case, however, was not such that the United States Employees' Compensation Commission felt justified in considering the case one in which benefits were due her under the provisions of the compensation act.

So they evidently decided that she was not engaged in such discharge of her duty that she was entitled to be compensated.

Mr. TRAMMELL. If the Senator will read the whole testimony, I do not think he will find that it carries out that idea.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is included in this report which the Senator filed.

Mr. EDGE. I think the award is $12.50 a week, $50 a month; is it not?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Yes; $50 a month.

Mr. EDGE. Which, as I understand, is less than would have been paid——

Mr. CARAWAY. I am not contesting that. I was just trying to find out if it is not an effort to put somebody on the compensation roll that is not entitled under the law to go there.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think she is entitled to go there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the objection to the bill still maintained?

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not object to it.

Mr. KING. I object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

AMENDMENT OF PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE IN FEDERAL COURTS

The bill (S. 1094) to amend the practice and procedure in Federal courts, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Let that go over.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question. As I understand, he objects to the bill. Does the Senator object to having it considered?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I object to having it considered when the Senate is on unobjected bills. It will require some discussion.

Mr. CARAWAY. It has passed the Senate. I want to appeal to the Senator from Pennsylvania, because the bill at one time passed the Senate in this form; and it was amended by the Senator from Pennsylvania himself on the floor, and he did not then object. I hope he will withdraw his objection and let us consider it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It involves so radical a change in the trial of cases at law that I do not feel that I ought to let it go without objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

MARIA J. M'SHANE

The bill (S. 1655) granting six months' pay to Maria J. McShane was announced as next in order.

Mr. TYDINGS. I move the substitution of the House bill for the Senate bill.

Mr. KING. Is that a valid claim?

Mr. TYDINGS. It is. It is simply to provide a beneficiary for moneys already provided by existing law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1405) granting six months' pay to Maria J. McShane.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill No. 1655 will be indefinitely postponed.

LOUISE A. WOOD

The bill (S. 61) granting an increase of pension to Louise A. Wood was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire whether it is customary to pass bills of this character?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. President, it is not unprecedented, but it is, of course, an unusual bill; and I think we all know that General Wood's services, if not unprecedented, were exceedingly unusual. I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate about a career with which all must be very familiar, unless I could perhaps persuade the Senator not to object.

Mr. KING. Then, of course, it means that the widow of every person who has the same military title that General Wood has would be entitled to the same compensation.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not think so. General Wood had an extraordinary career, both as soldier and as administrator. As we all know, as a very young man, when a surgeon, he took charge of a detachment in the Indian war, where he led an expedition at great hazard and difficulty with extraordinary success. After that he returned to practice as a surgeon——

Mr. KING. I am familiar with the record of General Wood, and I would not detract at all from the value of his services or his great ability; but I think for the moment, until we consider the implications and the precedents, we had better temporarily lay the bill aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

GEORGE A. ROBERTSON

The bill (S. 1541) for the relief of George A. Robertson was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act approved September 7, 1916, entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States receiving injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," are hereby extended to George A. Robertson for the loss of his right eye while employed by the Department of the Interior in Glacier National Park in the year 1913, and that he be paid such sums as would properly be due him within the provisions of section 4 of the said act of September 7, 1916. The United States Employees' Compensation Commission is hereby authorized and directed to make payments in compliance with the terms of the said act of September 7, 1916, and in accordance with the rules and regulations of said commission. Any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated is hereby appropriated for the purpose of this act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as I understand, this bill is to place the claimant under the provisions of the compensation act. Is that correct?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is. At the time the injury occurred, in 1913, the statute was limited to those who suffered injuries in manufacturing establishments, hazardous occupations, and that sort of thing. In 1916 it was expanded to take in all employees of the Government, and this man was denied recovery because he had not been in the service in the particular class of occupations covered by the statute.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator if there is a favorable report on this bill?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes. Let me explain: This man was in the National Park Service, a guard in the Glacier National Park in the State of Montana. A storm coming on, he took refuge with another man in a log cabin, and they started to make a fire. An explosion occurred, which injured both of them, and destroyed entirely the sight of this man's eye. Apparently, somebody had dropped a cartridge or something of that kind; so that the injury was received in the regular discharge of his duty.

At that time, however, the statute read as follows:

That when, on or after August 1, 1908, any person employed by the United States as an artisan or laborer in any of its manufacturing establishments, arsenals, or navy yards, or in the construction of river and harbor or fortification works, or in hazardous employment on construction work in the reclamation of arid lands, or the management and control of the same, or in hazardous employment under the Isthmian Canal Commission, is injured in the course of such employment"—

Then he may recover, and so forth. This man could not qualify under those classifications.

Mr. SMOOT. But was a special act ever introduced for him?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a wonder, because nearly every one that was injured has always had a special act.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is what this bill is.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. This bill has been here repeatedly, and I think has passed the Senate several times.

Mr. SMOOT. Not in this form, however. The rule was to give an amount equal to a year's salary. That used to be our rule.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think the rule has been to put the claimant under the provisions of the compensation act.

Mr. SMOOT. Very few bills, I will say to the Senator, have ever been passed in that way.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It seems to me that whatever is done about the matter, that is the most appropriate thing to do. The passage of the bill has been repeatedly recommended by the Department of the Interior. He is to get the same amount that he would get if he had come under the compensation act.

Mr. TRAMMELL. As I remember, this man suffered a most terrible injury—the loss of both eyes. He is completely blind, as I remember.

Mr. SMOOT. I think only one eye.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. One eye.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I remember that he was here, and I knew that he had lost at least one eye. I thought he had lost his sight entirely, however.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think that was another case.

Mr. SMOOT. The only reason why I question the advisability of it is that in the past we have always, in injury cases of that kind, given outright a year's salary.

That was brought about because of the fact that the law applied first to the Canal Zone, and the Committee on Claims reported hundreds of bills giving a year's salary to those who were injured similarly to the manner in which this man was injured. If he falls under the compensation act, I do not know how much per month he would receive, because I do not know the extent of his injuries.

Mr. FLETCHER. His right eye is gone.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. On September 7, 1916, the present law was passed, the initial clause of which reads as follows:

That the United States shall pay compensation as hereinafter specified for the disability or death of any employee resulting from personal injury sustained while in the performance of duty.

So that we recognize now, at least, the justice of treating the employees of the Government in this way. I suppose the law states what compensation is given for the loss of one eye. I have not inquired into it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to have the Government treat this man just as we have treated so many other employees; but I will ask the Senator whether the bill specifically provides any amount, or provides that he shall be given an amount according to the provisions of the act?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It provides that he shall be paid in accordance with the provisions of the act.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, does the law contain a table showing the amounts to be given in different cases?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The general act provides how much shall be paid for the loss of an eye.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. I would like to ask the Senator whether he knows how many people have suffered injuries, prior to the enactment of this law, who would be embraced if the act were made retroactive. There is no stronger reason for including this man than anybody else who was injured.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have not the information.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN NAVAL AND MARINE OFFICERS

The bill (S. 150) for the relief of former officers of the United States Naval Reserve Force and the United States Marine Corps Reserve who were erroneously released from active duty and disenrolled at places other than their homes or places of enrollment was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments, on page 2, line 1, to strike out the word "erroneously," and on line 2, after the word "conditions," to insert the words "and not at his own request," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the General Accounting Office is hereby authorized to pay mileage at the rate of 8 cents per mile, computed by the shortest usually traveled route, for travel actually performed within one year from date and place of release from active duty or disenrollment to their homes or places of enrollment, to such former officers of the United States Naval Reserve Force or United States Marine Corps Reserve who have been released from active service or disenrolled under honorable conditions and not at his own request at places other than their homes or places of enrollment, upon the presentation by such former officers of satisfactory evidence showing that they actually performed such travel to their homes or places of enrollment: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall be applicable only to former officers of the United States Naval Reserve Force or United States Marine Corps Reserve who were actually released from active duty or disenrolled under honorable conditions prior to July 1, 1922.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think there should be an explanation of this bill. It may be all right.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California is recognized for that purpose.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, the title of the bill really indicates its purpose. The Secretary of the Navy, to whom the matter was referred, reports favorably. There is quite an elaborate letter from him to the Speaker of the House, in the course of which he says that it had been submitted to the Bureau of the Budget, and that it was not out of harmony with the financial program.

The matter is simply this: The officers referred to were disenrolled at certain places throughout the United States, and not at the places where they entered into the service. Under the technical provision of the law the Accounting Office was not authorized to allow them mileage to return to their respective homes. All the departments which have looked into the matter deem the relief just and proper, and I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The bill provides that the General Accounting Office is authorized to pay mileage. Does the Accounting Office make payments?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I understand that it is so. The bill is so framed as to authorize the payment of the several amounts when they have been ascertained.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The function of the Accounting Office is to audit payments made by other departments of the Government.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Granted.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I meant my suggestion to be helpful. I am afraid it would be said that the Accounting Office has no funds available to pay and never does pay.

Mr. SMOOT. Did the Senator from Pennsylvania object to the word "authorized"?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. "Authorized to pay." The Accounting Office does not make payments.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think it wise to let the matter go over temporarily.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if it is going over temporarily, may I make one suggestion to the Senator?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The report seems to indicate that there are 31,000 officers covered. I can not believe that any such number of officers were separated from the service without getting their mileage home. As a matter of fact, I have not read of any officer who did not get his mileage home after he was separated from the service. I would like to have the Senator, if he can, get the Navy Department to furnish us the information so that we will know approximately the amount involved, and why these officers were not given mileage home when many others were allowed mileage.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The information as to the number does come, apparently authoritatively, from the Secretary of the Navy, in his letter to the Speaker of the House. I assumed that that is approximately the number. They were disenrolled at cities and points throughout this great country other than where they were enrolled and entered into the service. Under the law, as it has been interpreted here, there was no legal way for reimbursing them for the expense of returning to their homes.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator will allow, that 31,000 reserve officers was the total number relieved from active duty, but that is not the number covered by this bill.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Precisely.

Mr. SMOOT. It specifically says that it is impossible to determine with accuracy the cost of this proposed legislation.

Mr. FLETCHER. They have not separated those who were discharged away from home from the others. The total number discharged was 31,000, but not all of those would come under this bill.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Precisely.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it would be proper for the Navy Department to let us know what would be involved.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It will also be necessary, according to this report of the Secretary of the Navy, to have an additional clerical force in the Navy Department. I think we ought to have more information about this bill.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Let me observe, Mr. President, for the benefit of Senators, that I assumed, of course, that this statement from the Secretary of the Navy would be ample information. I do not know, indeed, what further or detailed information we can secure. However, we will look into it further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

EXTENSION OF TIME UNDER COAL PERMITS

The bill (S. 1455) to grant extensions of time under coal permits was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any coal prospecting permit issued under the act entitled "An act to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain," approved February 25, 1920, as amended, may be extended by the Secretary of the Interior for a period of two years, if he shall find that the permittee has been unable, with the exercise of reasonable diligence, to determine the existence or workability of coal deposits in the area covered by the permit and desires to prosecute further prospecting or exploration, or for other reasons in the opinion of the Secretary warranting such extension.

SEC. 2. Upon application to the Secretary of the Interior, and subject to valid intervening rights and to the provision of section 1 of this act, any coal permit that has already expired because of lack of authority under existing law to make extensions, may, in the discretion of the Secretary, be extended for a period of two years from the date of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. 2021) extending and continuing to January 12, 1930, the provisions of "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to determine and confirm by patent in the nature of a deed of quitclaim the title to lots in the city of Pensacola, Fla.," approved January 12, 1925, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to determine and confirm by patent in the nature of a deed of quitclaim the title to lots in the city of Pensacola, Fla.," approved January 12, 1925, be, and the same are hereby, extended and continued to January 12, 1930.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

U. S. S. "DISPATCH"

The bill (S. 771) providing for the loan of the U. S. S. Dispatch to the State of Florida was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized and directed to loan to the State of Florida, for such time and upon such conditions as he deems advisable, for the use of the fisheries department of such State, the U. S. S. Dispatch, together with all her apparel, charts, books, and instruments of navigation; but no expense shall be caused the United States by the delivery or the return of such vessel, and the State of Florida shall assume responsibility for all expenses for repair and upkeep of the vessel and for any damage which may be caused to the vessel while loaned to such State.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1271) to more effectively meet the obligations of the United States under the migratory bird treaty with Great Britain by lessening the dangers threatening migratory game birds from drainage and other causes, by the acquisition of areas of land and of water to furnish in perpetuity reservations for the adequate protection of such birds; and by providing funds for the establishment of such areas, their maintenance and improvement, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Committee on Agriculture have reported that bill favorably. Senator KING and others have objected to it coming up at this time for consideration and desire further deliberation on the bill. Under those circumstances, until we can determine its exact status, I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

NEAR EAST RELIEF (INC.)

The bill (S. 1287) for the relief of the Near East Relief (Inc.) was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cancel and abandon the claim in the sum of $632,669 with interest for United States property sold in 1919 to the Near East Relief (Inc.) for use in relieving and supplying the pressing needs of the peoples of the countries involved in the late war.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARIA MAYKOVICA

The bill (S. 2591) for the relief of Maria Maykovica was considered as in Committee on the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 to compensate Maria Maykovica, a widow without children, for permanent bodily injuries received and sustained by her on the evening of September 23, 1923, when she was struck by an Army truck as she was crossing Barracks Road, about two blocks south of Mannons' Park, St. Louis County, Mo. The injuries sustained included compound fracture of the right leg, entire left arm lacerated, breaking of several ribs, etc., and was caused by negligence of United States soldiers driving the Army truck.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

S. DAVIDSON & SONS

The bill (S. 1122) for the relief of S. Davidson & Sons, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to S. Davidson & Sons, of Marvell, Ark., the sum of $341.41, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, on account of forfeiture of bond in case of Will Jones.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

U. S. TRANSPORT "FLORENCE LUCKENBACH"

The bill (S. 2585) for the relief of the owners of the cargo laden aboard the U. S. transport Florence Luckenbach on or about December 27, 1918, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, is this a bill authorizing reference to the Court of Claims?

Mr. COPELAND. To a district court. It has twice passed the Senate.

Mr. KING. Why not refer it to the Court of Claims?

Mr. COPELAND. It goes to the district court sitting as a court of admiralty.

Mr. KING. I would like to inquire if that has been the custom in dealing with these cases. It seems to me that if that policy shall be pursued, the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims will be greatly narrowed in all of these cases, and all claims against the Government will be referred to the local district courts instead of to the Court of Claims, where now these suits are brought.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, this particular case arose out of an accident which was due to the negligence of a United States ship, and it was found by the board of inquiry that the Federal Government was at fault; but no power lay in that particular department of the Government to award damages. This is a maritime matter, and it was thought best to authorize the company owning this boat to go into the maritime courts with the usual safeguards as to notice, the provision that judgment may be given against the plaintiff, and so on. We passed three or four bills like this this morning—practically the same thing. They have all grown out of maritime accidents. This accident happened in New York, where all the witnesses live.

Mr. KING. I understood that the bills we passed a few moments ago, at the instance of the Senator from New York, were referred to the Court of Claims, that the causes of action, if there were causes of action, were referred to the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims has had jurisdiction of many of these marine disasters, and these claims for damages against the Government for the negligence of those who were operating Government boats. I was wondering why we now take away from the Court of Claims their jurisdiction and refer the case to the local district court.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, the courts of admiralty are the courts which have jurisdiction, as the Senator so well knows, of accidents at sea. The Court of Claims has no special qualifications to deal with those cases. I think that in practically every case of this kind we have authorized the people to go into the district court and sue.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not know of a case just like this, but if the Senator will pardon me, I may say that we have had—I was going to say hundreds—at least scores of cases since I have been a Member of the Senate where collisions have occurred between barges or boats owned by private individuals and boats owned by the Government of the United States, by the Navy, or by the Shipping Board, and we have referred those cases to the Court of Claims to determine whether there was liability, and, if so, to assess the damages.

Mr. BAYARD. May I say to the Senator that in the short time since I have been a Member of the Senate ninety-nine and a fraction per cent of these cases have been referred to the district courts as against a fraction of 1 per cent to the Court of Claims. There have been upwards of 150 cases of that kind referred to the district courts.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator is in error if he includes in his statement those cases in which there have been collisions and damages were claimed because of a collision between privately owned and Government-owned vessels.

Mr. BAYARD. That is the very class of cases to which I am referring. I have been on the Committee on Claims during that whole period, and I speak with knowledge.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I will state to my friend the Senator from Utah that I was for some years a member of the Committee on Claims, and I can corroborate absolutely the statements made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] with reference to that matter. Since I have been a Senator, and during the time I was on the Committee on Claims, a very considerable number of negligence cases have been referred to the district courts of the United States for adjudication.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claims of all owners of various shipments of merchandise which were laden on board the U. S. transport Florence Luckenbach, at the time hereinafter mentioned, against the United States of America for damages alleged to have been caused by fire and by water used to extinguish fire on or about the 27th day of December, 1918, at Locust Point, Baltimore, Md., may be sued for by the said owners of cargo in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court; and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suits and to enter judgments or decrees for the amounts of such damages, including costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the owners of said cargo, or against the owners of said cargo in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and same measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notices of the suits shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by orders of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suits shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COAST TRANSIT DIVISION BARGE "NO. 4"

The bill (S. 2586) for the relief of the owner of the Coast Transit Division barge No. 4 was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the owner of the Coast Transit Division barge No. 4 against the United States of America for damages and loss alleged to have been caused by collision between said barge and the U. S. S. Ball on or about the 17th day of April, 1919, near Pennsylvania Railroad Pier F, Jersey City, N. J., may be sued for by the said owner in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, sitting as a court of admiralty, and acting under the rules governing such court; and the said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the owner of the said Coast Transit Division barge No. 4 or against the owner of the said Coast Transit Division barge No. 4, in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and same measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROTECTION OF WATERSHEDS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 1181) authorizing an appropriation to be expended under the provisions of section 7 of the act of March 1, 1911, entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers," as amended.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I understand the bill will take but a short time, and I ask unanimous consent that after its final disposition we shall devote the balance of the afternoon to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar, beginning where we left off a moment ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request preferred by the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. JONES. The agreement proposed is not to interfere with the presentation and consideration of conference reports?

Mr. CURTIS. No.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] spoke to me about a matter involving a conference report. Before consenting to the unanimous-consent agreement I wish to say to the junior Senator from Washington that I shall give way temporarily for the consideration of conference reports.

Mr. CURTIS. There is no objection to that.

Mr. McNARY. With that understanding, that I may not be unfaithful to my promise to the junior Senator from Washington, I am agreeable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request preferred by the Senator from Kansas? The Chair hears none, and the unanimous-consent order is entered.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee as to what was done with regard to the Senate amendment increasing the amount available for the transportation of Diplomatic, Consular, and Foreign Service officers under the provisions of the Rogers Act?

Mr. JONES. The conferees agreed on $45,000 instead of $46,900, as passed by the Senate.

Mr. BINGHAM. What did the conferees do with regard to an increased appropriation for aircraft in commerce?

Mr. JONES. The House agreed to the amount in the first item on page 53 as passed by the Senate, $702,000, and the item on page 54 was accepted as the Senate passed it, decreased by $25,000.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Washington what was done with regard to the increased appropriation for the district offices of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce?

Mr. JONES. The House accepted the Senate provisions.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am very much gratified to learn that that was the result.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9481) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. SMOOT, Mr. JONES, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. GLASS conferees on the part of the Senate.

PROTECTION OF WATERSHEDS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1181) authorizing an appropriation to be expended under the provisions of section 7 of the act of March 1, 1911, entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers," as amended.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in just a few words I shall explain the very brief bill which is now the unfinished business. The sole purpose of the bill is to authorize an appropriation for the acquisition of forested, cut-over, and denuded areas on the watersheds of navigable streams. The authority for the legislation is found in the Weeks Act passed by Congress in March, 1911, and the so-called forestry act, known as the Clarke-McNary Act of 1924.

For a period of 17 years, since the enactment of the Weeks law, the Government, by this scheme of acquiring areas through Federal appropriation, has acquired approximately 3,000,000 acres of land. In acquiring these properties the Government has expended $17,000,000, and, as I said, has acquired practically 3,000,000 acres of land in the forested areas of our navigable streams.

The act of 1924, which is supplementary to the Weeks Act, also required that the Government acquire this area in watersheds of navigable streams, and also provided that the lands may be denuded or cut over. Therefore the Government is able to practice reforestation in those areas where the navigability of streams is not protected now as it used to be when it involved forested areas.

When the bill came before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry it called for an appropriation of $40,000,000 extending over a period of 10 years. After hearings were held before the committee an amendment was offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] which changed somewhat the plan of the appropriation. It did not increase the amount, which remains at $40,000,000, but did shorten the period over which the money should be expended.

The bill, if passed, makes $1,000,000 immediately available; $1,000,000 available on July 1, 1928; $3,000,000 available on July 1, 1929; $4,000,000 available on July 1, 1930; $4,000,000 available July 1, 1931; $5,000,000 available July 1, 1932; $5,000,000 available July 31, 1933; $5,000,000 available July 1, 1934; $5,000,000 available July 31, 1935; and $6,000,000 available July 1, 1936, constituting the total appropriation of $40,000,000.

The National Forest Reservation Commission, which cooperates with the Department of Agriculture in the acquisition of these areas, consists of seven members, one of whom is the distinguished junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES]. It is the purpose of the commission, if this appropriation be made, to acquire approximately 2,500,000 acres in the south Appalachian Mountain Range, about an equal amount in the White Mountain region of New England, and about 3,000,000 acres in the three Great Lakes States—Wisconsin, Michigan, and Minnesota.

There is no reason that I can see why I should go into detail concerning the great value which has come through the invoking of section 6 of the Weeks Act. I may add in conclusion that of the $17,000,000 which has been expended, most of it has been in the Southern States and but little in the Great Lake States or in the New England States. None of the money, it is thought or contemplated, will be expended in any of that section of the country west of the Mississippi River save in two or three border States. The land heretofore acquired has increased in value, at a conservative appraisement, at least $1,000,000. It is thought that on account of the peculiar situation and the options now controlled by the National Forest Conservation Commission, the areas can be purchased now much more cheaply than they can within a year or two years from now. The purpose to speed up the program is the theory for cutting down the program from 10 years to 8 years.

I ask unanimous consent that, as a part of my remarks, a letter written to me by the Chief Forester may be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., January 17, 1928.

Hon. CHARLES L. MCNARY,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture and Forestry,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR MCNARY: The request for a report upon the bill S. 1181 is received.

This bill would authorize appropriations aggregating $40,000,000 at the rate of $3,000,000 a year for the fiscal years 1930 to 1934, inclusive, and $5,000,000 a year for the years between 1935 and 1939, both inclusive, these appropriations to be available until expended for the purchase of lands under the provisions of section 7 of the act of March 1, 1911 (36 Stat. 961), as amended by the acts of March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. 828), June 30, 1914 (38 Stat. 441), and the act of June 7, 1924 (43 Stat. 653).

Appropriations under section 7 of the act of March 1, 1911, are for the purpose of acquiring forest lands on the watersheds of navigable streams for preserving their navigability. Under this act and under subsequent legislation appropriations to date have been as follows:

Fiscal year—
1910 (all reverted to Treasury)	$1,000,000
1911 (of which $1,982,679.24 reverted)	2,000,000
1922	1,000,000
1927	1,000,000
Total appropriations	20,318,540
Reverted to Treasury	2,982,679
Net appropriations	17,335,861

The original plan under which this work was inaugurated contemplated the ultimate acquisition by the Government of 5,000,000 acres in the southern Appalachian region and 1,000,000 acres in the White Mountains region. From time to time the original purchase areas have been enlarged and new areas have been created in Alabama, Arkansas, and Pennsylvania. The purchase areas approved by the National Forest Reservation Commission under the original Weeks law, act of March 1, 1911, as amended, as they now exist, contain a total gross area of 9,171,569 acres. Of this area, however, 927,000 acres is known to possess agricultural, mineral, or water-power values which preclude its purchase. Also, there is 922,815 acres that was reserved from the public domain and 11,369 acres that was transferred from the Treasury Department.

At the present time the purchase of 2,909,588 acres has been authorized within the Weeks law forests, at an average price of $5.26 per acre, a total cost of $15,315,540. The net unacquired acreage suitable for national forest purposes in the existing purchase units, therefore, is approximately 4,150,000 acres. Some of this, however, is held at such high prices by the owners that purchase is inadvisable, while other owners are so managing their forest properties that acquisition by the Government is unnecessary.

Ultimately it may prove desirable to establish under the Weeks law additional purchase units, possibly in eastern Kentucky, in southeastern Oklahoma, and in Vermont, States which have passed enabling acts authorizing such action. Not only would the national forests so established protect important watersheds and constitute important sources of timber supply, but they would serve as demonstrational areas. To complete the Weeks law forests, including new units, would require an additional 4,000,000 acres of land, and the expenditure on the basis of previous costs would be $25,000,000. The major purpose of the bill S. 1181 is to authorize appropriations aggregating this sum over a 10-year period.

Section 6 of the Clarke-McNary Act (43 Stat. 653) broadens the field of purchase under which lands can be acquired under the Weeks law, because of the conviction of the Senate Select Committee on Reforestation (created by S. Res. 398, 67th Cong.), which drafted that act, that the purchase provisions of the Weeks law should be extended in order to permit the establishment of national forests on limited areas in the great stretches of cut-over and denuded forest lands which exist in portions of the eastern half of the United States. The records of the select committee are filled with testimony as to the urgency of Federal assistance, through purchase, in working out the very large problems of restoring these cut-over denuded areas to productive forests, particularly at the hearings held in the Lake States and in the pine districts of the South. (See Rept. No. 28, January 10, 1924.) One purpose of the present bill (S. 1181) would be to authorize appropriations aggregating $15,000,000 during a 10-year period to carry out the provisions of this section of the Clarke-McNary Act.

Under the present law, which is unchanged by the proposed bill, no purchases can be made in any State without the concurrence of that State through an enabling act adopted by its own legislature. This of itself would dispose of any question as to interference with the rights of jurisdiction of the States concerned. If a State so desires, it may prevent any Federal purchases of forest land within its borders by declining to enact an enabling law, or it may by the terms of its enabling act limit the acreage of land to be acquired by the Federal Government. This has been done by the States in several instances. A State which desires to terminate purchases of land by the National Government can do so immediately by repealing its enabling act. The entire program is thus predicated upon the concurrence of the States, not only in the first instance but through the continuation of the local enabling legislation.

Up to the present time 22 States have passed enabling acts, some of them with area limitations, concurring in Federal purchases of land within their borders under either the Weeks law or the Clarke-McNary law. In the case of three States—Wisconsin, Oklahoma, and Mississippi—the enabling legislation of the State has been enacted subsequent to the passage of the Clarke-McNary law and in pursuance of the policy of purchase provided by section 6 of that law. In the case of three other States—Florida, Michigan, and Minnesota—while the enabling act preceded the Clarke-McNary law, it became operative only with the enactment of this Federal statute because the class of lands available for purchase could not be acquired except under the terms of section 6 of the Clarke-McNary Act.

Section 6 of the Clarke-McNary law affords opportunity to extend the purchase work in at least six States which have concurred in and invited such extension and which have, in a measure, framed their own State forest policies in anticipation that Federal purchases would be so extended, as section 6 of the Clarge-McNary act contemplated. Failure to extend the Federal policy of buying forest lands would constitute a discrimination against the interests of a considerable number of States which desire to have such purchases made within their borders, and would tend to make the purchase policy a sectional one rather than a national one. Such a course would be contrary to the very pronounced expression of public sentiment all over the country as to the desirability of extending Federal purchases, as the Clarke-McNary law intended should be done.

Section 6 of the Clarke-McNary Act provides, in conformity with constitutional limitations, that all such purchases shall be located within the watersheds of navigable streams. It is, however, the obvious intent of section 6 that, while all such acquisitions are viewed as having a beneficial effect upon the flow of navigable rivers, the primary purpose underlying any specific purchase may be either for the protection of stream flow or for the production of timber. In some of the regions where the benefits of this act should apply the lands will be on the watersheds of navigable streams, but it will not be possible conscientiously to allege that their forest cover will markedly affect navigation, since the major justification for their acquisition will be their value as sources of timber supply, and, more important still, their value as demonstration areas and centers of cooperation with other landowners.

The Lake States offer a specific situation. It is extremely doubtful if any land could be acquired in this section on a conclusive and positive showing of the necessity for such purchases to protect the headwaters of navigable streams. But this region is the logical and necessary source of supply of forest products for a very large section of the United States, including the Dakotas, Nebraska, Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio. The Lake States contain an enormous acreage of denuded forest lands. They are now struggling with a tremendous land problem which affects their economic life and rural prosperity to a very serious degree. They have all asked by legislative enactment for the assistance of the Federal Government in the restoration of their denuded forest lands under section 6 of the Clarke-McNary Act. A number of areas have been selected for purchase, all on the watersheds of navigable streams and all in the centers of very much larger sections where every possible effort toward reforestation should be exerted. The areas selected will aid the reforestation of the whole region through timber planting, demonstrations of forestry practice, and areas which will become the centers of effective protection from fire. To deny this form of Federal assistance would mean not only discrimination against the Lake States in the application of a general policy but discrimination against the surrounding States which look to the Great Lakes region for a direct and cheaply available source of timber products.

The Lake States contain large areas of cut-over land which originally supported white and Norway pines. After the virgin timber was cut jack pine and scrub hardwoods followed in many places, but in others even this inferior growth has been practically destroyed by fire so that it will be necessary to reestablish a forest cover by artificial means. The forests of the Lake States have contributed an enormous amount of timber for the upbuilding of the industries of the Nation, and it is essential in our future economy that these lands be restored to timber production. Of the total original forested area of 112,000,000 acres in the three States of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota less than 24,000,000 acres now remain, while of the cut-over lands 21,000,000 acres are at present estimated to be fire-swept and devastated sand plain and swamp with no promise of future earning value unless prompt and radical measures are taken for rehabilitation. The area is so large and the conditions are so adverse that there is little promise of any large portion of these lands being restored to timber production by other than public initiative unless it can be demonstrated that this can be profitably done by private interests. It is proposed that approximately 2,500,000 acres of land largely of the denuded type described shall be acquired by the Federal Government and administered as national forests. On account of its present unproductive condition it seems that it should be possible to acquire this area at not to exceed $2.50 an acre, including the cost of purchase. This would necessitate the expenditure in the Lake States of about $6,250,000.

There already exist in Minnesota two national forests, and especially on the Superior National Forest are there large areas of alienated lands which should be acquired to facilitate efficient administration. In recognition of this fact the National Forest Reservation Commission has created a purchase area embracing the Superior Forest. In Wisconsin there is no national forest, but the State has recently enacted legislation authorizing the Federal Government to purchase and administer forest lands in the State. Similar legislation has been in existence in Michigan and Minnesota for some time. In Michigan there exist three separate and much-dissected parcels of forest land, consisting of remnants of public domain, which are administered as a national forest. Two of these units have been included within a purchase area with a view to promoting their consolidation and better management. There is urgent need for consolidation of these units for administrative reasons. The purchases proposed in the Lake States would embrace but 4½ per cent of their forest lands, but the consummation of such a program will not only be of utility as a national source of timber supply but of great demonstrational value to the private landowners and the States in this region.

Studies which were made in the southern pine belt show that four-fifths of the original yellow-pine forests has been cut since 1870, and that out of more than 100,000,000 acres of yellow-pine land that have been cut over nearly 31,000,000 acres have not come back to pine, although much of it is more suitable for timber growth than agriculture. During the past few decades the lumber produced in the Southern States has been the mainstay of national consumption. The problem of the unproductive pine lands is more than a local one, and it seems urgent that a system of national forests should be established in this region not only to again make productive a portion of the denuded lands but to serve the important function of demonstrational forests in pointing the way to a profitable development and use of these cut-over and at present unproductive lands. At present there are no national forests within the pine region of the Southern States except the small forests in Florida and the small areas acquired for military purposes, which are now, under the terms of section 9 of the Clarke-McNary Act, administered as national forests. It is believed that 2,500,000 acres of land should be acquired in this region, at a cost of $3.50 per acre for purchase, which will require an outlay of approximately $8,750,000. It would involve the purchase of but 2 per cent of the forest lands in the southern pine region.

A number of units for purchase under section 6 of the Clarke-McNary Act have been examined in the southern pine belt. In every case where enabling legislation has been enacted by the State and the State forestry department concurs, it is the purpose of the Forest Service to submit units for the consideration of the National Forest Reservation Commission as soon as funds are made available, in order that purchases may be instituted in the very important southern pine region and the policy of Federal aid in reforestation extended to that section of the country. Local interests are urging the initiation of these purchases, all of which lie within the watersheds of navigable streams, but most or all of which will probably not be classified as necessary to the protection of the navigability of such streams. This entire program, designed to give the southern pine district the benefits of the Clarke-McNary Act, should in equity be carried out.

The maximum purchases possible under the authorizations set up in the Senate bill would embrace but a very small proportion of types of land which require constructive management to reclaim their productive values. The report of the Select Reforestation Committee of the Senate, submitted to the first session of the Sixty-eighth Congress, brings out that the Lake States now contain 26,000,000 acres of second-growth timber or young forest and over 19,000,000 acres of forest land that is practically denuded and barren; and that the southern pine region contains in excess of 30,000,000 acres of denuded land. The purchases possible under the authorizations proposed by the State bill would not exceed two and one-half million acres in the Lake States and two and one-half million acres in the southern pine States. The aggregate of the 5,000,000 acres to be acquired under the policy proposed would mean about one-tenth of the acreage of denuded and cut-over lands existing in these two regions alone in 1923, and only 2½ per cent of their total area of forest land. There can thus be no wholesale buying out of private lands or extinguishment of the rights of the States and counties to tax such lands. The fundamental idea of the entire program is the development of a system of key areas upon which to work out and demonstrate the problems of research, experimentation, and administrative practices essential to successful forest management in the region; and to serve as centers of cooperative action between all interested agencies, looking to State, county, and private agencies for the productive management of the bulk of the forest lands.

To summarize, present circumstances indicate that the complete accomplishment of the intent of Congress, as expressed in the acts approved March 1, 1911, and June 7, 1924, will require the further purchase of 4,000,000 acres to complete the original Weeks law program; of about two and one-half million acres in the Lake States; and of an approximately equal area within the pine belt of the Southern States. Should Senate bill 1181 be adopted, and appropriations later made in accordance with its authorization, the department would be able to make and carry out the plans which are necessary to accomplish the purposes of the Weeks law and the Clarke-McNary law.

On referring this report to the Bureau of the Budget as required by circular 49 of that bureau, the following comment was made by the director, General Lord:

"I have to advise you that if the provisions of the proposed legislation were amended so as to limit the authorization to $2,000,000 for the fiscal year 1929 and $2,000,000 for the fiscal year 1930, it would not be in conflict with the financial program of the President. A two-year program of this kind would be in harmony with the authorized program for good roads and also for other Federal aid programs."

Sincerely yours,

W. M. JARDINE, Secretary.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in conclusion may I say that the able Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], who is also a member of the National Forest Conservation Commission, has an amendment to offer, which I have considered at length, in conjunction with the Secretary of Agriculture and the Chief Forester, and, if proposed by the Senator, it is my purpose to accept it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, it is well remembered, no doubt, that I fought this bill at the last session with considerable success. I have consulted with the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry [Mr. McNARY], the Chief Forester, and the Secretary of Agriculture. We talked about an amendment which would cover my objection to the bill. They having agreed to it, I shall make no further objection. The amendment reads as follows and is rather a limitation:

Provided, That, except for the protection of the headwaters of navigable streams or the control and reduction of floods therein, no land shall be purchased under the appropriation herein authorized in excess of 1,000,000 acres in any one State.

I understand that the Senator from Oregon will accept the amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator who is offering the amendment why he limits it? In other words, if it is improper to purchase the land at all, why not say so?

Mr. OVERMAN. I think 1,000,000 acres is enough in each State to protect the headwaters of navigable streams. The original bill, which was passed for that purpose, known as the Weeks Act, was held constitutional. This goes into the question of flood control, and the fight I made against it heretofore was that they might purchase not only 1,000,000 but 4,000,000 or 6,000,000 or 10,000,000 acres of land, and thus wipe out an entire State. That is what they could have done if they were authorized to proceed without limit. The limitation to 1,000,000 acres is to protect our navigable streams and also to protect the flood waters.

Mr. KING. I may not quite understand the effect of the amendment, but as I do understand it it simply means that the commission may purchase not to exceed 1,000,000 acres in any one State for flood control. It does not limit them, however, to the purchase of 1,000,000 acres for reforestation or for any other purpose unless the original act itself limits it. In other words, they may purchase more than 1,000,000 acres within any State for reforestation pure and simple.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; they can not purchase more than a million acres.

Mr. McNARY. The application of the bill is simple. It only deals with the navigability of streams and the safeguarding of the watersheds of our streams. It is not apart whatsoever from the main purpose of protecting the navigability of our streams except in those watersheds where the timber has been cut off, where the bill permits replanting or replacement of forests. It does limit the area that may be purchased in any one State to 1,000,000 acres.

Mr. KING. For all purposes?

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The language of the amendment is:

Provided, That, except for the protection of the headwaters of navigable streams or the control and reduction of floods therein, no land shall be purchased under the appropriation herein authorized in excess of 1,000,000 acres in any one State.

The simple and only correct construction of the amendment seems to me to be that for the protection of the headwaters of navigable streams or the control and reduction of floods therein, the limitation does not apply, and any area found necessary may be purchased. The limitation relates to lands purchased for other purposes than the protection of the headwaters and flood control.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Senator is not correct about that.

As a part of my remarks, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a statement by the Forestry Department, to accompany my remarks, and also a statement showing the policy of the department with reference to the purchase of these lands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statements referred to are as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
FOREST SERVICE,
Washington, January 21, 1928.

Hon. LEE S. OVERMAN,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR OVERMAN: Since the Clarke-McNary act was passed in 1924, the Forest Service has carefully studied the extent to which forest lands should be acquired by the Federal Government under its terms; first, to protect headwaters and prevent floods on navigable streams, and, second, to promote timber production in cut-over and denuded areas. This has led to the formulation of a fairly complete program, which I desire to submit for your consideration.

In shaping this program three considerations were paramount:

(1) The need for consolidating Federal ownership within national-forest units hitherto established by the National Forest Reservation Commission for protecting the headwaters of navigable streams.

(2) The establishment of a few additional areas primarily to protect the headwaters of navigable streams and reduce floods therein. There are still a number of important headwater areas where such protection is needed.

(3) The creation of a limited number of additional national forests within the watersheds of navigable streams but primarily to aid in timber production in regions containing extensive areas of cut-over and denuded land. Such units will also have a beneficial influence in the protection of navigable streams through the restoration of forest cover and the prevention of erosion. The region where this class of national forests are most needed are the pine belt of the South and the northern portions of the Lake States.

The proposed program is summarized in the following table:

State	National forest area acquired or approved	Additional areas to be acquired primarily for watershed protection and flood control	Additional areas to be acquired on watersheds, navigable streams, primarily to aid in timber production	Total area ultimately to be in Federal ownership	Per cent of State area

All of these national forests will serve the important purposes of (1) research, experimentation, and demonstration of methods of forest management; and (2) of cooperation with the States, counties, and private owners in many phases of forestry.

All of these requirements of the situation, as nearly as I have been able to determine them, are set forth, State by State, in the foregoing table. The execution of such a program will be contingent upon the continued concurrence and approval of the States. The Federal law, as you of course know, provides that before any purchases can be made in a State, its consent must be obtained through appropriate action of the legislature. In addition to that it is the policy of the Forest Service to recommend the establishment of purchase areas only in the event that they are specifically approved and concurred in by the forest or conservation agencies of the State concerned. You thus will see that the carrying out of the program outlined rests wholly upon the continued concurrence of the State.

As stated before, the program contemplates the establishment of some purchase areas which will not be primarily for watershed protection or flood control, but to aid the production of timber and the encouragement of sound methods of forest management on surrounding privately owned land. In these cases, of course, watershed protection will be a factor, but another factor in itself justifying the proposed program is that of aiding the States and owners of private land through research and demonstration of the best practices and methods of timber production. This is particularly applicable in regions where vast areas of cut-over and denuded land present an outstanding land and economic problem.

The program outlined represents an estimated expenditure of $40,000,000. Of this amount approximately $25,000,000 will be necessary to complete acquisition within the existing national-forest units in which approximately 4,000,000 acres of land remain to be acquired. In the Lake States the cost of acquiring new units will be approximately $6,250,000, while in the southern-pine States the cost is estimated to be approximately $8,750,000. So far as I can foresee, the program proposed will place in Federal control approximately the maximum acreage needed by the Federal Government to carry out its part of the work of watershed protection, flood control, and timber production. The rate at which this program shall be carried out will depend, of course, upon the authorizations and appropriations which are approved by Congress.

As you will note from the table, the percentage of the total land area or the total forested area of any State, proposed for ultimate acquisition by the Federal Government is small. Aside from New Hampshire, where special conditions prevail, the largest percentage of the area of any State to be acquired is in North Carolina, and amounts to but 5 per cent. There can be no danger that the purchase of lands for national forest purposes under this program would be carried to a point where it would militate against the best interests of the State or of the owners of forest land therein.

The future of forestry in the United States, as I see it, rests primarily with the States and with the owners of private forest lands. The function of the Federal Government should not be one of extended land ownership and control so much as one of cooperation and helpfulness. There are, however, certain regions in which Federal ownership of limited areas, especially of land presenting special needs for stream protection or flood control or of land presenting the more complicated and difficult problems of forest restoration would be eminently desirable. It is such areas which are contemplated in the program now under consideration.

Very sincerely yours,

W. B. GREELEY,
Forester.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
FOREST SERVICE,
Washington, January 20, 1928.

Hon. LEE S. OVERMAN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR OVERMAN: In accordance with our conference of this morning regarding the character and scope of forest purchases contemplated under Senate bill 1181, I am inclosing a memorandum which summarizes in concise form the approximate areas which the Forest Service believes should be acquired as national forests under the terms of existing legislation. These areas are classified as to the major purposes of the purchase. The memorandum also shows the percentage of the area of each State which would be in the ownership of the Federal Government when this program of purchases is completed, and summarizes the more important points in the policy of the Forest Service regarding the extension of national forests in relation to the interests of the States.

I have drafted this memorandum with reference to your using it as an insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD should you so desire.

In order to clearly express the policy intended under Senate bill 1181, and in accordance with your own suggestion, I suggest that you offer an amendment to this bill as follows:

Amend S. 1181 as reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry January 9, 1928, by adding at the end of line 18, page 2, the following:

"Provided, That, except for the protection of the headwaters of navigable streams or the control and reduction of floods therein, no lands shall be purchased under the appropriations herein authorized in excess of 1,000,000 acres in any one State."

This would, I believe, put the policy entirely in the clear and provide adequate safeguards against any undue extensions of the national forests for purposes other than the protection of the headwaters of navigable streams or the control of floods.

Very sincerely yours,

W. B. GREELEY,
Forester.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, referring to this amendment, I am very greatly confused, as the able Senator from North Carolina is not clear as to the meaning and comprehensiveness or the limitations upon the amendment. If I understand my able leader, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], he places the same interpretation upon this amendment which I place upon it, namely, that there may be purchased not to exceed 1,000,000 acres in any one State for the protection of the country from floods.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No.

Mr. OVERMAN. No.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Utah has it just reversed. There is no limitation on the area that may be purchased for the purposes of flood control. There is, however, a limitation on the area that may be purchased for any other purpose than affecting the headwaters of navigable streams and for flood control, and that limitation is 1,000,000 acres. The commission may purchase any area for flood control, but it can only purchase not to exceed a million acres for any other purpose.

Mr. OVERMAN. For the protection of headwaters of navigable streams in excess of 1,000,000 acres may be purchased. That is provided for under the bill, which is known as the Weeks bill. This measure is supplemental to that and provides that not more than a million acres shall be purchased for reforestation in any State. That is as I understand it. The Senator from Oregon will correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think the amendment which was prepared by the Forester, with the consent of my distinguished friend, rather fits the situation. We all know the limitation on Congress as defined in the commerce clause of the Constitution. The power of Congress is limited to the acquisition of areas that will benefit in some way the navigability of navigable streams. The thought which the Senator from North Carolina had in mind was to place a limitation beyond which the Department of Agriculture could not go, namely, the acquisition of a million acres in any one State. Knowing the limitations, and what the Senator from North Carolina has in his mind, I am willing that the language may be changed to please the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator from Oregon for what purpose the appropriation of $40,000,000 may be made? Will the Senator from Oregon enumerate all the purposes and state where the discretion is lodged?

Mr. McNARY. I think unquestionably the Constitution confers upon Congress the right to appropriate public funds to promote flood control and the navigability of our streams, and one of the incidents to the promotion of navigability is the acquisition and maintenance of forests, to hold back flood waters, and equate the flow of those streams. It has never been my contention that we could, dissociated from the navigable waters of a stream, acquire areas for the purpose of reforestation. This bill and the Weeks Act and the Clarke-McNary Act all go upon the theory that Congress may not acquire any lands unless they are within the watersheds of navigable streams.

The great purpose of this bill and the amendment to the Weeks Act is not only to permit the Secretary of Agriculture, cooperating with the National Forest Conservation Commission, to acquire forest areas but to acquire areas that are denuded, on which trees may be grown to bring about beneficial results that attended the growth and continuance of our ancient forests.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. McNARY. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. KING. Is there any provision in the Weeks Act or in any supplemental legislation which attempts to secure the cooperation of the States—because undoubtedly the States receive benefits—and if cooperation is secured, upon what basis is the contribution made?

Mr. McNARY. Under the Weeks Act the Government can not acquire any areas in the watersheds of our navigable streams without the cooperation and consent of the States; a State must first pass an enabling act that will permit it to take advantage of the appropriations made by Congress. That is the safety provision in the bill for the States; that gives the States the right to maintain their sovereignty; and if any State in any section of the country where this law would apply objects to accepting the appropriation, it lies within the power of that State so to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the committee amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 3, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry proposes to strike out "$3,000,000 available July 1, 1929; $3,000,000 available July 1, 1930; $3,000,000 available July 1, 1931; $3,000,000 available July 1, 1932; $3,000,000 available July 1, 1933; $5,000,000 available July 1, 1934; $5,000,000 available July 1, 1935; $5,000,000 available July 1, 1936; $5,000,000 available July 1, 1937; and $5,000,000 available July 1, 1938; in all for this period $40,000,000, to be available until expended" and to insert "available upon the passage and approval of this bill, $1,000,000; available July 1, 1928, $2,000,000; available July 1, 1929, $3,000,000; available July 1, 1930, $4,000,000; available July 1, 1931, $4,000,000; available July 1, 1932, $5,000,000; available July 1, 1933, $5,000,000; available July 1, 1934, $5,000,000; available July 1, 1935,

$5,000,000; available July 1, 1936, $6,000,000; in all for this period, $40,000,000, to be available until expended," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the provisions of section 7 of the act of March 1, 1911 (36 Stat. 961), as amended by the acts of March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. 828), June 30, 1914 (38 Stat. 441), and the act of June 7, 1924 (Public, 270), available upon the passage and approval of this bill, $1,000,000; available July 1, 1928, $2,000,000; available July 1, 1929, $3,000,000; available July 1, 1930, $4,000,000; available July 1, 1931, $4,000,000; available July 1, 1932, $5,000,000; available July 1, 1933, $5,000,000; available July 1, 1934, $5,000,000; available July 1, 1935, $5,000,000; available July 1, 1936, $6,000,000; in all for this period, $40,000,000, to be available until expended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina to the committee amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from North Carolina proposes to add at the end of the committee amendment, in line 18, the following:

Provided, That, except for the protection of the headwaters of navigable streams or the control and reduction of floods therein, no lands shall be purchased under the appropriations herein authorized in excess of 1,000,000 acres in any one State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to amendment of the Senator from North Carolina to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADRIANO CRUCETA

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next bill on the calendar.

The bill (S. 2420) for the relief of Adriano Cruceta, a citizen of the Dominican Republic, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. Let us have an explanation of that bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think we should have some explanation of this bill. It appears to appropriate a small compensation for the unlawful shooting or killing of a person by a United States Marine. I should like to be advised as to the circumstances under which this claim arises, and the manner in which the sum of $1,000 was arrived at as adequate compensation.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I do not recall, perhaps, the minute details in reference to the bill, but the facts are these: American marines, for some reason—I do not know why—were stationed in the Dominican Republic. One of the marines was doing sentry duty. It became his duty to guard a rubbish pile. He had been instructed not to let anyone interfere with that pile of rubbish. A boy came up and was probing around in the rubbish. He was directed to cease. Then the sentry, taking his duty very seriously, placed the boy under arrest. The boy, as most of his age would have done, ran, and he was shot in the back and killed.

The amount carried in the bill, which, in my judgment, is too small, was agreed upon by the father of the boy, and the statement is made that he would be satisfied to accept the small amount named in the bill in full satisfaction of damages resulting from this unwarranted killing. That is the nature of the bill which was reported favorably from the committee by me.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. How old was the boy?

Mr. BLACK. The boy's exact age is not given. It is simply stated that he was a boy. I gather that he was something like 12 years of age. That was the conclusion I reached from the facts which appear in the record.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which proposes to pay $1,000 to Adriano Cruceta as compensation for the death of his son at Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic, resulting from shooting by a member of the United States Marine Corps on the 22d day of August, 1923, the payment to be as a matter of grace and without regard to liability for such death.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIM OF CITY OF NEW YORK

The bill (S. 459) for the relief of the city of New York was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask that the Senator withhold his objection for a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. I will withhold the objection in order that the Senator may explain the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senate will recall that a statute passed a long time ago reimbursed certain States for various expenditures made at the time of the disturbance from 1861 to 1865. Those States were reimbursed. From time to time since then cities have likewise been reimbursed, amongst others the city of Baltimore. Very recently we passed a bill through the Senate reimbursing the city of Baltimore for its expenditures under exactly similar circumstances as are covered by the bill now under discussion.

It will be recalled that a million dollars was appropriated by the Common Council of the City of New York and bonds were issued in that amount. At my request the Senate in the Sixty-eighth Congress authorized an audit to be made of these accounts. That audit has been very carefully made; all the records have been searched; the original vouchers dug up; and from the determination of the auditors it has been found that while a million dollars was expended a considerable amount was spent for the relief of families of soldiers. The auditors very properly held that that was not a proper charge against the Government, but after excluding all such credits which the Government had a right to ask it was determined by the auditors that the amount of $764,000 was due the city as stated in the bill.

Mr. President, what we are asking for here is in harmony with precedents. States have been reimbursed, various cities have been reimbursed, and it is only right that the city of New York should be repaid under the conditions set forth in the auditors' recommendations, which are fully set out in the report accompanying the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would not want the bill acted upon unless I knew something of the attitude of the officials of the Government in regard to it. I would want to know whether they had made any investigation of it; what they consider to be the obligation of the Government. There is nothing in the report showing the attitude of the officials of the Government, and, therefore, I ask that the bill go over, so that I may obtain that information.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, I shall accede to the request of the Senator, but I do wish to point out that the claim has been audited by the officials of the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. That may be, but I notice there is not a word in the report to show it.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator will look on page 10 of the report, he will find the heading at the top of the page "The result of the audit." This is the official decision of the auditor general after going into the matter very carefully.

Mr. SMOOT. I will take the report to my office and shall ask the department for further information.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ROSE THURIN

The bill (S. 623) for the relief of Rose Thurin, was announced as next in order. The bill had been reported adversely from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, that bill should be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I see the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], who evidently is interested in the bill, as he introduced it, is not present, and I think it should go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

The bill (H. R. 278) to amend section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of certain public buildings, and for other purposes," approved May 25, 1926, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over.

Mr. KEYES. Mr. President, will not the Senator kindly withhold his objection, in order that I may make a very brief statement concerning the bill?

Mr. KING. Yes; but I thought, in view of the magnitude of the measure and the large appropriations made, the Senator would feel that it could not be disposed of under the five-minute rule.

Mr. KEYES. I think it can be, Mr. President.

Mr. KING. I withhold the objection.

Mr. KEYES. While the amount is large, it does not change the policy that we have already established in the act passed in May, 1926, called our public buildings bill. This bill seeks to amend section 5 of the public buildings bill simply by increasing the amount of authorization for erecting public buildings outside of the District of Columbia.

The bill originally passed provided for $100,000,000 outside the District of Columbia. This bill seeks to increase that amount to $200,000,000. It has passed the House without any serious objection at all and there was no objection whatever in the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The bill is simply to carry out the policy that we have already established and I did not imagine there would be any serious objection to it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I note that in the report of the committee there is the statement—and that the minimum amount for this purpose should be at least $2,000,000,000.

That should read "$200,000,000," I take it, from the statement.

Mr. KEYES. Exactly. That is an error in the printing.

Mr. SMOOT. The report says it was an error in printing.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, as I understand, this simply adds to the amount another $100,000,000. It does not change the law in any respect?

Mr. KEYES. That is just what the bill does.

Mr. SMITH. And it leaves the $50,000,000 available for the District of Columbia as it was in the original law?

Mr. KEYES. Yes; and makes $15,000,000 available for buildings outside the District, which were authorized as far back as 1913, I think.

Mr. SMOOT. That was one-tenth of the $150,000,000. This simply adds $100,000,000, and increases the $5,000,000 that the original law provided for to be expended in any one city to $10,000,000, because of the increase of the appropriation.

Mr. SMITH. What was done with what we might call the preferred buildings that we made provision for?

Mr. SMOOT. They are already appropriated for, and come out of the first $100,000,000.

Mr. SMITH. They come out of the first $100,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes.

Mr. SMITH. And this additional $100,000,000 is to take care of whatever may be necessary throughout the country?

Mr. SMOOT. Outside of those.

Mr. SMITH. I think it is a very wise provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah insist upon the objection?

Mr. KING. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the original bill provided that so many buildings were to be built every year. Does this bill appropriate for those buildings for the next five years? Will this bill cover that?

Mr. SMOOT. This bill doubles it.

Mr. OVERMAN. It does not change the policy at all?

Mr. SMOOT. It does not change the policy, but it doubles the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. KEYES. That is it exactly.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments, on page 2, line 9, after the word "limitation," to insert "beginning with the fiscal year 1928"; and on page 3, line 3, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$5,000,000" and insert "$10,000,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first paragraph of section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of certain public buildings, and for other purposes," approved May 25, 1926, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act the sum of $250,000,000, in addition to the amount authorized in section 3 hereof, is hereby authorized to be appropriated, but under this authorization and from appropriations (exclusive of appropriations made for 'remodeling and enlarging public buildings'), heretofore made for the acquisition of sites for, or the construction, enlarging, remodeling, or extension of, public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, not more than $35,000,000 in the aggregate shall be expended annually (except that any part of the balance of such sum of $35,000,000 remaining unexpended at the end of any year may be expended in any subsequent year without reference to this limitation beginning with the fiscal year 1928): Provided, That such amount as is necessary, not to exceed $50,000,000 of the total amount authorized to be expended under the provisions of this act, shall be available for projects in the District of Columbia, and not more than $10,000,000 thereof shall be expended annually (except that any part of the balance of such sum of $10,000,000 remaining unexpended at the end of any year may be expended in any subsequent year without reference to this limitation): Provided, That at least one-fifth of the expenditures outside of the District of Columbia during the fiscal year 1927 shall be for the buildings heretofore authorized, and at least one-fifth of the expenditures for the fiscal year 1928 and at least one-fifth of the expenditures for the fiscal year 1929 shall be for a like purpose, unless a less amount shall be necessary to complete all of such buildings: Provided further, That expenditures outside the District of Columbia under the provisions of this section shall not exceed the sum of $10,000,000 annually in any one of the States, Territories, or possessions of the United States."

(b) The last paragraph of such section 5 is amended by striking out "$150,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$250,000,000."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ADRIANO CRUCETA

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, a few moments ago we passed Senate bill 2420, for the relief of Adriano Cruceta. The House has already passed a similar bill, which is No. 182 on the calendar; and it has also been reported favorably.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator ask for the reconsideration of the action of the Senate?

Mr. BLACK. I think it should be reconsidered, and we should act on the House bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks for the reconsideration of the votes whereby Senate bill 2420 was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator now asks for the consideration of the House bill on the same subject.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8889) for the relief of Adriano Cruceta, a citizen of the Dominican Republic.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate bill will be indefinitely postponed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 777) making eligible for retirement under certain conditions, officers and former officers of the Army of the United States, other than officers of the Regular Army, who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the World War, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, at the request of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], I shall have to ask that that bill may go over.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee will state it.

Mr. TYSON. Under what particular rule are we proceeding?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the five-minute rule.

Mr. TYSON. Is it in order to move to take up a bill notwithstanding an objection?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By a unanimous-consent agreement we are acting upon unobjected bills only.

LANDS IN PHOENIX, ARIZ.

The bill (S. 1692) granting a part of the Federal building site at Phoenix, Ariz., to the city of Phoenix for street purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I find that an identical House bill, H. R. 6466, has been reported to the Senate and is Order of Business No. 205. I ask that the House bill be substituted for the Senate bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6466) granting a part of the Federal building site at Phoenix, Ariz., to the city of Phoenix for street purposes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate bill is indefinitely postponed.

ROSE THURIN

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, in my absence a few moments ago Senate bill 623, Order of Business 114, for the relief of Rose Thurin, was temporarily passed over. I ask that we return to that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. KING. One moment, Mr. President.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, all I shall ask is an opportunity to vote my convictions upon the bill. I recognize the impossibility of securing favorable action in view of the adverse report. Without criticizing the committee, I feel that they are hardly justified in making that report; but the report is here and, as I say, I shall not resist the action upon it. I can not very well do so.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in view of the attitude of the Senator from Ohio, contesting the correctness of the report, I think we ought to have this case determined on its merits. What are the facts upon which the bill is to be indefinitely postponed?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, this is a case where a woman in 1924 slipped down the steps of a post office located in a rented building. The Comptroller General held that she could make no claim against the United States because it was rented property, and, furthermore, that she had the opportunity and privilege of bringing suit against the owners of the property. Therefore, in view of these facts, your committee decided that this bill should be adversely reported and indefinitely postponed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Upon what theory should one recover damages from the owner of a building if she accidentally falls, unless the owner had been negligent in some way? I should like to hear the Senator from Ohio vindicate the attitude he has taken in support of this bill.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I appreciate very greatly the fine spirit manifested by my friend, the distinguished Senator from Arkansas; but I realize that there are Senators here who want to act upon other bills, and that, in view of the adverse report, we probably can not reverse the action. I am ready to vote upon the bill. I shall vote against the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But if the Senator from Ohio will give the Senate an opportunity to determine the merits of his case, I assure him that some of us, at least, will not be so unreasonable as to support an unjust report on the part of this committee.

I take it that for some mysterious reason the Senator from Ohio declines to justify his support of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the motion to postpone indefinitely.

The motion to postpone indefinitely was agreed to.

RADIO REGULATION

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent to take up out of order the amendment to the radio act, and I will state my reason before I make the request.

The Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce has had the confirmation of the Radio Commissioners up for consideration for some time.

Mr. SMOOT. What is the number of the bill?

Mr. DILL. It is No. 228 on the calendar. It was agreed in committee this morning that if certain amendments were made it would make the solution of the question of confirmation much easier. The committee is to meet in a few minutes. I think there will be no objection to the amendments that are in Senate bill 2317, which continue the commission for one year and also limits the commission's power to granting licenses for not to exceed six months, instead of three years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill referred to by the Senator from Washington?

Mr. KING. Do I understand that if it is considered we are limited to the five-minute rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the rule we are.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, of course if the bill is going to bring about any particular debate it would not do very much good to take it up now, I will say to the Senator, because the committee is just about to go into session again. We have found it very difficult, in view of this peculiar situation, either to vote to turn down these appointments or to confirm them, unless the whole matter shall be put in a temporary form; and that is what these amendments mean—just to put it so that we can move along with an experimental process, without committing the Government too far in any of these acts.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator, if we pass the bill, will it not in all probability preclude the Senate or the House from considering this whole question of the radio upon its merits?

Mr. PITTMAN. I think not.

Mr. DILL. It does the very opposite.

Mr. PITTMAN. We are trying to preserve it so that that can be done.

Mr. DILL. That is the thing we are trying to do.

Mr. KING. What I mean is, there will be no other legislation, probably, this year.

Mr. PITTMAN. Oh, yes; there probably will be. We are still going on with our hearings, but we do not want to turn down these men. There is nothing particularly against them, and yet there is not so very much that we can find in favor of them. No one understands this subject; that is the truth about it, right now, as I look at it. What we want to do is to make a temporary matter out of this and say that these commissioners shall have their offices expire in two years from the passage of this act.

Mr. KING. I thought it was one year.

Mr. DILL. The present law provides for six years.

Mr. PITTMAN. Their term expires in 1929 under this bill, instead of in six years. The next proposition, the amendment that the Senator from Washington has, is that they shall not be allowed to let licenses that will commit the Government for a long time.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Nevada a question. Are the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Washington in agreement on this matter?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; and I think the whole committee are.

Mr. CURTIS. That is the question I wanted to ask. If I may have the attention of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], I have just been informed by the Senator from Michigan that these confirmations are for five years.

Mr. DILL. That is what we are trying to amend, so that it will only be until next February. We are trying to amend the bill so that it will be only until next February. That was our purpose in having this amendment made.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Washington that that can be done just as well after the confirmation, by a new bill abolishing the commission and reenacting it, as it can be done by this process. If this process is followed, we are informed that the House probably will not agree to it, and these confirmations will not be made for a long period of time. The Committee on Interstate Commerce authorized me this afternoon to report favorably the nomination of these three commissioners.

Mr. DILL. Is the Senator opposed to continuing the commission for one year?

Mr. COUZENS. No; but I do not think it ought to interfere in any way with the confirmation of these nominees.

Mr. DILL. I may say to the Senator that it does interfere. That was the view of the members of the committee to-day.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am somewhat confused. The Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] states that in order to get an agreement with regard to the confirmation of these appointees this bill must be passed at once. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] states that he has just been authorized by the committee to report the nominations favorably. I should like to have the matter cleared up.

Mr. DILL. The understanding was that the bill would be taken up this afternoon.

Mr. COUZENS. We had a meeting at 2.30 and waited for Senators; and it was said they were on the floor and could not come up. There were about 10 of us present, who voted unanimously for confirmation.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator from Washington and the Senator from Nevada were present this morning, and the Senator from Montana was present, and the Senator from Missouri was present when the question of the confirmation of these gentlemen came up; and, as I stated, and as the Senator knows, there has been great doubt with regard to their confirmation, not by reason of anything particularly against them but for reasons which appealed to us. I suggested in the committee at that time that if the appointments did not last for a long period of time—say, for six years——

Mr. COUZENS. Five years.

Mr. PITTMAN. That if it were limited to two years from the passage of the act, which would extend the period to February, 1929, I would be willing to vote for the confirmation. Nearly every Senator there spoke up and said, "I think that is the solution of the trouble. We are willing to vote for confirmation for that length of time, but not for six years." Senator DILL and I prepared the amendment. While we were preparing the amendment, we understand now from the Senator that there has been a vote to report out the confirmations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. COUZENS. I think there ought to be an objection until we get together again.

Mr. DILL. I do not want to take up the time of the Senate——

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, there will be an adjournment when the Senate concludes its business to-day. Why not let the matter go over and be taken up in the morning hour to-morrow?

Mr. DILL. I do not want to take up time, and I withdraw my request.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Regular order!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request is withdrawn, and the clerk will call the next bill on the calendar.

DAVID M'D. SHEARER

The bill (S. 2720) for the relief of David McD. Shearer was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I object to the consideration of the bill, and I do not want to have the bill considered by the Senate unless I am present. I have given a great deal of attention to this claim for the last 10 years, or nearly 10 years. Mr. David Shearer was in the employ of the Government and was paid by the Government. All the paraphernalia and the building of the necessary machinery was paid for by the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the bill will go over.

Mr. SMOOT. He was then in the employ of the Government. I have gone over this claim a great many times.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make a statement?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has a right to make it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. This bill has passed the Senate on a number of former occasions. It carries no appropriation. It provides that this man may submit to the Court of Claims his claim that he is entitled to remuneration for a device which he originated during his off hours, not while he was performing any official duty in connection with the Government. That is his claim.

Mr. SMOOT. When we discuss the matter we shall go over that. The bill passed the Senate when I was not present, but I gave a great deal of attention to the matter, went into it thoroughly, and if he is entitled to compensation——

Mr. SHEPPARD. Allow me to answer the Senator, in order that the Senate may have a proper conception of the controversy. I do not say that Mr. Shearer is entitled to remuneration. The bill does not provide that he shall have remuneration. It merely provides that he may submit his claim to the Court of Claims for adjudication. The courts have held heretofore that if an employee of the Government develops a device in his off hours, and while he is not engaged in the official work of the Government, and the Government takes his patent and uses it, the Government must pay him. I do not claim that this is a case of that kind. It is his contention that it is. The bill provides that he may submit the merits of the measure to the Court of Claims.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Utah to make plain his reasons for asserting that under no conditions is this claimant entitled to be heard by the Court of Claims.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in this case all the material was furnished by the Government. If I am informed correctly, this was not done during the man's off hours. I gave days to the consideration of his claim, got statements from the department at the time, and I did not see that he had a shadow of a claim.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The court might take a different view from that of the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. The court might.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Regular order!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the next bill on the calendar.

VANCOUVER BARRACKS MILITARY RESERVATION

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I do not like to ask to have a bill taken up out of order, but I have to go to a committee meeting in a very few minutes, and Calendar No. 178 is a local measure which passed the Senate at the last session and has passed the House at this session. I ask for the consideration of House bill 172, an act to authorize the Secretary of War to grant and convey to the city of Vancouver a perpetual easement for public-highway purposes over and upon a portion of the Vancouver Barracks Military Reservation in the State of Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to considering the bill to which the Senator has referred?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is the bill recommended by the Secretary of War?

Mr. JONES. It is recommended by the War Department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA

The bill (S. 2310) supplementary to, and amendatory of, the incorporation of the Catholic University of America, organized under and by virtue of a certificate of incorporation pursuant to class 1, chapter 18, of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the incorporation of the Catholic University of America under chapter 18, Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, be, and the same is hereby, approved and confirmed.

SEC. 2. That in addition to the rights, duties, and obligations enjoyed and imposed by chapter 18 of the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia the said university may enter into affiliated agreements with any institutions of learning within or outside of the District of Columbia, for the purpose of giving to students of such institutions the educational facilities of said university, upon such terms as are mutually agreed upon by the said university and the affiliated institutions.

SEC. 3. That said university shall have, and is hereby given, the power to increase the number of its trustees from time to time by a two-thirds vote of the whole number of the trustees at the time such vote is taken to a number not exceeding 50.

In case of the increase of the number of trustees a certificate stating the number of the board and the time when it shall go into effect, and that the action so taken was by a two-thirds vote as required by this act, shall be filed with the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 4. The said board of trustees shall have, and are hereby given, full power and authority, by a vote of two-thirds of its members, to adopt and change by-laws for the conduct of the business and educational work of said university, to fix the time of meetings, regular and special, and the form of notice to be given; they may appoint an executive committee composed of trustees, designate the number and chairman thereof, with such powers and authority as are usually exercised by an executive committee, and which shall be conferred by the board subject always to the control of the board of trustees; they may create and establish schools and departments of learning to be connected with and become a part of said university, and establish such scholastic boards and officers as may be required for academic operation and direction in education; they may receive, invest, and administer endowments and gifts of money and property absolute or subject to payments by way of annuities during the life of the donor, for the maintenance of educational work by said university and by any department or chair thereof, now established or which may hereafter be created or established by said university, and they shall have all of the powers and authority heretofore granted to or invested in the trustees of said university by chapter 18 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia.

SEC. 5. That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to prevent Congress from altering, amending, or repealing the same.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will not the Senator who introduced this bill make an explanation of it? There is no report accompanying the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the Catholic University of America is a corporation organized under the laws of the District of Columbia. It was organized about 1890, I think. It has grown to very extensive proportions since that time, and the authorities of the institution are very desirous of amending the articles of incorporation so as to meet the present requirements.

I supposed, when the matter was presented to me, that it would be a simple thing to have the amendment made pursuant to the laws of the District of Columbia, but I was surprised to find that there is no law of the District authorizing amendments of articles of incorporation of corporations organized here, and the only way to get relief is through an act of Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. I have just read the bill through for the first time, and I see no objection to it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. A letter from Mr. Hamilton, who is the attorney for the corporation, explains in full the nature of the changes in the articles of incorporation; and I ask that that letter be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Catholic University, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR BISHOP: I am submitting the following as containing the information requested by Senator WALSH in his letter of the 25th instant, addressed to you.

The Catholic University of America was incorporated not under the District Code, which was enacted in 1901, but was incorporated April 19, 1887, under chapter 18 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia.

A printed copy of the certificate of incorporation and of some of the more pertinent sections of said chapter 18 relating to the incorporation of institutions of learning are hereto attached.

Section 676 of said chapter 18, you will observe, provides that "Congress may, at any time, alter, amend, or repeal this chapter, saving and preserving all rights which may become vested under the same, and may amend or repeal any incorporation formed or created under this chapter." * * *

While the District Code permits corporations existing prior to its enactment to be reincorporated under the code, the Catholic University did not, and does not, desire to be incorporated under the code, because of the number of irresponsible educational institutions incorporated thereunder; but as a matter of fact there is no provision in the code for any amendment.

To increase the number of trustees or directors authorized by the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, above referred to, requires an application to Congress; but the Catholic University is seeking other privileges which could not be obtained under the code.

The right to enter into affiliated agreements with institutions of learning within or outside of the District of Columbia, for the purpose of giving to students of such institutions the educational facilities of said university, is asked for in the act introduced by Senator WALSH. This right or privilege has been granted by Congress to another institution of learning, to wit, George Washington University (Columbian College), act of March 3, 1905 (sec. 3, 33 Stat. 1036).

The power to increase, as above stated, its trustees has also been conferred upon the same institution. Section 1 of said act of March 3, 1905, and the power to change its by-laws for the conduct of the business and educational work of the university, to fix time of meetings, regular and special, is also given to the same institution by act of Congress of March 18, 1898 (30 Stat. 328).

The power to establish such scholastic boards and officers as may be required for academic operation and direction in education, and to "receive, invest, and administer endowments and gifts of money and property absolute or subject to payments by way of annuities during the life of the donor," is asked for by the Catholic University in order to clear uncertainties caused by section 523 Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, which provides that—

"Such corporation shall hold the property of the institution solely for the purposes of education, and not for the benefit of themselves or of any contributor to the endowment thereof."

The great growth and development of the Catholic University and its high standing among the educational institutions of the country require the changes asked for in the conduct of its work and business incident to its development as an institution of learning, and there is no way to obtain these changes except by direct application to Congress required by the sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia above referred to.

You could say to Senator WALSH that I would be very much pleased to still further discuss these needs of the university with him, or with his committee, if desired by him.

I am returning letter from Senator WALSH and also sending two copies of the bill as reported.

With kind regards, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE E. HAMILTON.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE

The bill (S. 760) granting the consent of Congress to the Ashland Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 5, line 15, to strike out "full" and insert "fully," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Ashland Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Ohio River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation between a point in the city limits of Ashland, Ky., and a point opposite in Coal Grove, Ohio, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon the Ashland Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches and terminals as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State in which such real estate or other property is situated, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation and expropriation of property in such State.

SEC. 3. The said Ashland Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

SEC. 4. After the completion of such bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War, either the State of Kentucky, the State of Ohio, any political subdivision of either of such States within or adjoining which any part of such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all right, title, and interest in such bridge and its approaches and any interest in real property necessary therefor, by purchase or by condemnation in accordance with the laws of either of such States governing the acquisition of private property for public purposes by condemnation. If at any time after the expiration of 30 years after the completion of such bridge the same is acquired by condemnation, the amount of damages or compensation to be allowed shall not include good will, going value, or prospective revenues or profits, but shall be limited to the sum of (1) the actual cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches, less a reasonable deduction for actual depreciation in value; (2) the actual cost of acquiring such interest in real property; (3) actual financing and promotion cost, not to exceed 10 per cent of the sum of the cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches and acquiring such interest in real property; and (4) actual expenditures for necessary improvements.

SEC. 5. If such bridge shall be taken over or acquired by the States or political subdivisions thereof, as provided in section 4 of this act, and if tolls are charged for the use thereof, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches, to pay an adequate return on the cost thereof, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the amount paid therefor as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the date of acquiring the same. After a sinking fund sufficient to pay the cost of acquiring the bridge and its approaches shall have been provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper care, repair, maintenance, and operation of the bridge and its approaches. An accurate record of the amount paid for acquiring the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for operating, repairing, and maintaining the same, and of the daily tolls collected shall be kept, and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 6. The Ashland Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall within 90 days after the completion of such bridge file with the Secretary of War a sworn itemized statement showing the actual original cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches, the actual cost of acquiring any interest in real property necessary therefor, and the actual financing and promotion costs. The Secretary of War may, at any time within three years after the completion of such bridge, investigate the actual cost of constructing the same and for such purpose the said Ashland Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall make available all its records in connection with the financing and the construction thereof. The findings of the Secretary of War as to the actual original cost of the bridge shall be conclusive, subject only to review in a court of equity for fraud or gross mistake.

SEC. 7. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act, is hereby granted to the Ashland Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

SEC. 8. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEAMSHIP "BOXLEY"

The bill (S. 2780) for the relief of the owners of cargo aboard the steamship Boxley was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of W. R. Grace & Co., owner of various shipments of merchandise which were laden on board of the steamship Boxley, at the time hereinafter mentioned, against the United States of America for damages alleged to have been caused by the unseaworthiness and negligence of the said steamship Boxley on her voyage from Iquique, Chile, to New Orleans, La., between the dates of January 5, 1920, and February 14, 1920, may be sued for by the said owners of cargo in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, sitting as a court of admiralty, and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the owners of said cargo, or against the owners of said cargo in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MORGAN MILLER

The bill (S. 2737) for the relief of Morgan Miller was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not see the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRIS] here. I examined the report, which showed that the claimant was injured and in the hospital five days. There is nothing to show any continuation of the injuries. I ask that the bill be temporarily laid aside. It may be an entirely meritorious claim, but there is no evidence here to justify the enactment of the measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be temporarily laid aside.

ESTATE OF BENJAMIN BRAZNELL

The bill (S. 2765) for the relief of the estate of Benjamin Braznell was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to reopen and allow the claim of the Braddock Trust Co., executor of the estate of Benjamin Braznell, late of Pittsburgh, Pa., and refund the sum of $2,323.47, the balance of taxes illegally collected under existing laws and decisions.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE subsequently said: Mr. President, in reference to Senate bill 2765, I note upon reading the report that the Secretary of the Treasury recommends that the relief be not granted. I would like to have an explanation of that measure, providing the Senator from Pennsylvania is willing that we shall return to it by unanimous consent.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Of course.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, this is a case which the Treasury admits is just, but claims that it ought not to be allowed because of a failure to file the claim for refund in time.

As a matter of fact, the claim for refund was filed in time, but was general in its wording. The Treasury Department admits that the money ought to be refunded if the refund was claimed in time, and they do not give any reason, as far as I can see, why the claim to which the attention was called was not sufficient.

The bill, as it came to the Senate in the Sixty-eighth and the Sixty-ninth Congresses, passed in both cases with a unanimous report from the Committee on Claims in each case, as is the fact now. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] has reported the bill from that committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin object?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I merely wanted to have an explanation.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, this is similar to a bill we passed the other day where all taxes had been paid in good faith, but the question had been raised with the Government that the representatives of the estate had gone down there and had done everything they possibly could. In fact, in this case they paid all the money into the Treasury Department, but the delay was so great on the part of the Treasury officials that it is perfectly true that the statute of limitations had run to a point where they could only make a certain part of the refund. It was no fault of the taxpayers, and this bill is solely to give them an even measure of justice when absolute good faith has been had on the part of the taxpayer. The money was paid in improvidently, but in good faith.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I am convinced, from the statements which the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Pennsylvania have made, that the bill should pass, but I should like to understand the theory upon which it was held that the statute of limitations ran after claim for refund had been filed, even though it was not in the exact form of language that the Treasury Department would have desired. In other words, do they have strict rules of pleadings there connected with the refunds of taxes? If so, what are they?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Apparently they had at that time. I believe it to be the fact that the records of this estate, as admitted by the department, disclose that such a claim was filed. The department did not say that, however, until their attention had been called to it twice.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The adverse report of the Secretary seems to contradict the statement that it was for the reason that the claim for refund was not filed within the proper time.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The first report from the Treasury Department said that no claim for refund had been filed. The second one admitted that a claim had been filed and said in confessing an avoidance:

> It does not appear, however, to be specifically directed to the transfers which were considered by the bureau as forming a taxable portion of decedent's gross estate.

As a matter of fact, the claim was filed for the whole thing. I think the position of the department is indefensible.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, with the explanations which have been made I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

WAR MINERALS RELIEF CASES

The bill (S. 1347) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1919, as amended, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1919, as amended, as reads "that the decision of the said Secretary shall be conclusive and final, subject to the limitations hereinafter provided," and so much of said section 5 as reads "that nothing in this section shall be construed to confer jurisdiction upon any court to entertain a suit against the United States," are hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. In cases where final decisions of the Secretary of the Interior have been heretofore rendered appeal to the Court of Claims shall be made within 90 days after the passage of this act; and in all cases where final decisions of the Secretary of the Interior have not heretofore been rendered appeals from such decisions to the Court of Claims shall be made within 90 days after such decisions shall have been rendered by said Secretary: Provided, That no acceptance or acquitance by any claimant of or for any settlement made heretofore by the said Secretary shall prevent or estop any appeal to the said Court of Claims, as herein provided for.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, no report accompanies the bill. If there is a report, it is not in my folder. It appears that this is quite an important bill, and I think we should have an explanation of its purposes.

Mr. ODDIE. Similar legislation has twice passed the Senate and failed of passage in the House, at the last session of Congress because of shortness of time. The Interior Department has ruled on various war claims in a manner that seems arbitrary and not in keeping with the law enacted by Congress. The pending bill provides that the claims shall be referred to the Court of Claims and it seems to me a perfectly fair proposition. The Secretary of the Interior is not in favor of it because he has been opposed to similar legislation heretofore. The Senate has twice passed similar legislation, in a slightly different form, in spite of his opposition. The pending bill places the matter right up to the Court of Claims. I think it is as fair a thing as could be done.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What class of claims are embraced in the authorization?

Mr. ODDIE. Only the war minerals relief claims.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It does not appear on the face of the bill. However, I have no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INVESTIGATION OF SINKING OF SUBMARINE "S-4"

The resolution (S. Res. 109) creating a committee of the Senate to investigate the sinking of the submarine S-4 was announced as next in order.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, just a few days ago we passed a similar resolution. Therefore I ask that this resolution may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

REFUND OF CERTAIN LEGACY TAXES ERRONEOUSLY COLLECTED

The bill (H. R. 7224) to extend the time for the refunding of certain legacy taxes erroneously collected was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I see no report accompanying the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator will find the report accompanying Calendar No. 14. I think it is an identical bill.

Mr. KING. What committee reported the bill? It does not seem to have emanated from the Finance Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. That is where it should have gone.

Mr. CURTIS. The Committee on Claims reported a similar Senate bill.

Mr. KING. The measure ought to have gone to the Committee on Finance. It involves a very serious question. It seems to me it provides for the return of taxes of a general character and there ought to be a general bill. We ought not to deal with the matter in piecemeal fashion. I shall object to its consideration for the moment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It has been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, as the Senator will see if he will look at the report accompanying S. 2185, Calendar No. 14.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, ought not both the measures to be referred to the Committee on Finance?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have no personal interest in the matter at all, but this morning when Calendar No. 14 was called I objected, observing that it was what I considered to be rather important legislation. Following that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] called my attention to the report accompanying the bill, and stated that under a Supreme Court decision 95 per cent of such taxes had already been refunded and that the measure was merely to take care of the other 5 per cent.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator would have no objection to the bill going to the Finance Committee?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I certainly would have none.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The reason why I ask is that we have in the revenue bill now before that committee some general provisions to take care of these class cases, as they are called, in which typical cases have been taken to the Supreme Court and decided in favor of the taxpayer, while the other members of the class sat by and did nothing but let the statute of limitations run against them.

I do not see why we should relieve this particular group of taxpayers unless we are going to establish a general rule for everybody. I do not think it is fair to ask the Senate to establish a precedent in this case which may embarrass us and cost us many millions of dollars in the other cases. We should solve it as one problem.

Mr. KING. The Senator obviously is not referring to Calendar No. 14 but to the measure concerning which I just challenged attention.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I was referring to both of them, because they accomplish the same thing. One is a Senate bill and the other a House bill, both directed at the same class of taxpayers. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that Calendar No. 14, the bill (S. 2185) to extend the time for the refunding of taxes erroneously collected from certain estates, and Calendar No. 135, the bill (H. R. 7224) to extend the time for the refunding of certain legacy taxes erroneously collected, both be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS

The bill (S. 1939) granting pensions and increase of pensions to widows and former widows of certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. It will take some little time for the proper consideration of the bill. I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

DEPARTMENTAL PREDICTIONS OF COTTON PRICES

The bill (S. 1413) to prohibit predictions with respect to cotton prices in any report, bulletin, or other publication issued by the Department of Agriculture or the Department of Commerce, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no report accompanying the bill. I would like to inquire if some one can explain it?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President, I reported the bill. I filed no written report, because I did not think it was necessary. So much has been said about the reports of the Secretary of Agriculture last September, in which he predicted lower prices for cotton, that I did not think it was necessary to file a written report upon this measure.

The bill relates only to predictions of prices of cotton. It does not include grain or corn. Some of the Senators from the Northwestern States suggested that grain and corn be included, but there was some difference among them, and so those farm products were not included. All the Senators from cotton-growing States are in favor of this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. This may be an advantage, but personally I can not see it. We save tens of thousands of dollars in this way by the departmental reports.

Mr. MAYFIELD. I do not think the Senator correctly grasps the purpose of the measure. The Secretary of Agriculture has no authority whatever to make a prediction as to the future price of any farm commodity.

Mr. SMOOT. Does that mean a prediction as to the number of bales?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Oh, no. The measure would only forbid the making of predictions as to the future trend of prices of cotton.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The purpose of the measure undoubtedly is wholesome. There is no use or justification for a public officer, whose duty it is to gather cotton statistics, to use his knowledge in attempting to influence the price of a product. It has occurred in the past frequently that forecasts of prices have been made purporting to have been based on statistics gathered, when the statistics themselves are subject to question.

The result has been confusion in the market. I do not know whether such a statute could be enforced, but the purpose of it is certainly wholesome.

Mr. SMOOT. If it is agreeable to the Senators from the cotton States, I certainly have no objection; but I can not see any good that may come from it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any officer or employee of the Department of Agriculture or of the Department of Commerce to include, or cause to be included, in any report, bulletin, or other publication issued by such departments any prediction with respect to cotton prices, or to cause to be published any such report, bulletin, or other publication containing any such prediction, or to authorize the publication of any statement or interview containing any such prediction which is based upon information received from official sources. Any such officer or employee who violates the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than $300 nor more than $1,000, or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both, and, in addition thereto, shall be removed from office, and shall be incapable thereafter of holding any office under the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS

The bill (S. 2900) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—BRIDGE BILLS

The bill (H. R. 108) granting the consent of Congress to the States of North Dakota and Minnesota to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Red River of the North was announced as next in order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I notice that the following calendar numbers, down to and including 169, are all bridge bills and appear to be in the usual form. I ask unanimous consent that they may be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to considering Calendar Nos. 141 to 169, inclusive, en bloc?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, would it be out of order to request that all bridge bills on the calendar be included? Why not include all the bridge bills on the calendar? They are all favorably reported by the committee. We might as well dispose of them all together instead of picking out this single block.

Mr. BINGHAM. We ought to have a reference to them.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think it would be necessary at least to specify the calendar numbers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Calendar Nos. 141 to 169, inclusive, will be considered en bloc.

Mr. DENEEN. Mr. President, may we not include Calendar No. 122 in that order?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, this is a very dangerous way to legislate, and I shall object. Let each bill be called and disposed of as it is called.

Mr. KING. Moreover, I venture to suggest that the attention of the Senate heretofore has been called to-day to the fact that a number of these bills are not in the form prescribed by the committee and do not measure up to the standard which has been adopted, and therefore we were compelled to refer some of the bills back to the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would ask the Senator from Arkansas whether he objects to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I object. I insist that each bill shall be read by title and that the Senate shall be given an opportunity to pass on that particular bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unanimous consent will be reconsidered without objection, and the clerk will report the bills on the calendar in their order.

REGISTRATION OF ARCHITECTS IN THE DISTRICT

The bill (S. 2660) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the examination and registration of architects and to regulate the practice of architecture in the District of Columbia," approved December 13, 1924, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me say this is a lengthy bill and appears to be of considerable importance. It was introduced by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] and reported by him. I think there ought to be an explanation of this bill. I do not think we ought to pass measures of this character without some Senator explaining what is in them.

Mr. CURTIS. The junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] is not in the Chamber at the moment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 781) requiring separate accommodations for white and colored passengers on the street cars of the District of Columbia was announced as next in order. The bill had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia adversely.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

TREATY FUNDS OF WISCONSIN POTTAWATOMIE INDIANS

The bill (S. 1759) to appropriate treaty funds due the Wisconsin Pottawatomi Indians was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $6,839, being the unappropriated balance of the total amount of $447,339 due the Wisconsin Pottawatomi Indians of Wisconsin and Michigan under the treaty of September 27, 1833 (7 Stat. L. 442), and the act of June 25, 1864 (13 Stat. L. 172), as set out in House Document No. 830, Sixtieth Congress, first session: Provided, That the unexpended balances of $37,044.55 in the appropriations made for said Indians by the acts of May 18, 1916 (39 Stat. L. 156), May 25, 1918 (40 Stat. L. 589), and June 30, 1919 (41 Stat. L. 29), and which have reverted to the Treasury, are hereby reappropriated; and that said sums, together with the unexpended balance of $4,347.73 in the appropriation for the purchase of land for said Indians made by the act of June 30, 1913 (38 Stat. L. 102), shall be subject to expenditure for their benefit or payment to them, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARTHUR WALDENMEYER

The bill (S. 2439) to amend the military record of Arthur Waldenmeyer was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Utah will withdraw his objection. This is a very worthy measure. The soldier served the entire term of his enlistment during the Spanish-American War while we were at war and was discharged honorably with character very good. Some time later he reenlisted. During the period of his second enlistment he fell into bad company, and the time being in pre-Volstead days, had a series of accidents and finally was dishonorably discharged. He had been absent, I think, for some 24 hours.

In view of the fact that his record during the war was very good and that he was discharged with "character very good," the committee believed that he ought to be given a pensionable status with his comrades with whom he served during the war, but which he is denied because during a subsequent enlistment he incurred the displeasure of the military authorities.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think it has been conceded that a dishonorable discharge debars, and properly so, an applicant for pension. Now, the Senator seeks to set aside that bar.

Mr. BINGHAM. At the close of the war he received an honorable discharge with "character very good." If he shall be granted a pension it will be because of his war service, even if he should have no pensionable status because of his subsequent service.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There were no criminal charges against him, were there?

Mr. BINGHAM. There were not.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. As I understand, he was merely drunk.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; he was sick. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. He was absent without leave.

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes; there were no criminal charges against him.

Mr. KING. Then, was it not a case of desertion?

Mr. BINGHAM. No.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. He was a brave soldier during the war.

Mr. BINGHAM. He got drunk several times.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, when a Puritan from Connecticut can approve it, I will not object.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the Senator.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 5, after the word "Army," to strike out "their widows, children, and dependent relatives"; and to strike out section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. The Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to grant to such Arthur Waldenmeyer a discharge certificate showing that he is held and considered to have been honorably discharged as of such date.

So as to make the bill read:

That in the administration of the pension laws or any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon persons honorably discharged from the United States Army, Arthur Waldenmeyer shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged as a private, Company F, Second Regiment Infantry, United States Army, on March 21, 1900; but no pension, pay, nor bounty shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAPT. JOSEPH W. LOEF

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1594) for the relief of Capt. Joseph W. Loef, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation of that bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, this bill is for the express purpose of correcting the date of the commission of Captain Loef. The authorities in making up the record certified that his service began on October 25, 1917, when in fact his services should have begun and did begin on August 15, 1917. Because of that error his commission, signed by the President, was dated some two months subsequent to the time when it should have been dated, and because of that fact he has lost some files in the promotion list. I think the War Department has corrected the error so far as it can do so; but, in order to correct the date of his commission, it takes an act of Congress to authorize the President to act, and this bill is for that one purpose.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 1, line 3, after the word "That," to insert "in order to rectify an error of the War Department in the computation of commission service," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That, in order to rectify an error of the War Department in the computation of commissioned service, the President be, and hereby is, authorized to commission Capt. Joseph W. Loef, Field Artillery, as an additional number as of July 1, 1920, with the pay and allowance of a captain from that date, the total number of captains not to be increased by the change in the date of this commission, and that Capt. Joseph W. Loef be placed in his proper place on both the promotion and relative rank lists according to the date of his commission as captain.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 132) to authorize the President to appoint Le Roy K. Pemberton a first lieutenant, Officers' Reserve Corps, United States Army, was announced as next in order.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs adversely.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, in view of the report accompanying the bill, I ask that it go over. I may question the report later.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator object to a motion to postpone it indefinitely?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I shall object. Let the bill go over, and I will upset the committee, I think, on it at the next hearing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2053) to establish a military record for Daniel P. Tafe was announced as next in order.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs adversely.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I ask to have the bill go over.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Is the Senator going to upset the committee on that bill also?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I will endeavor to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

THOMAS JOHNSEN

The bill (S. 138) for the relief of Thomas Johnsen was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation of that measure.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The report is before the Senate and gives the details.

Mr. KING. Let it go over temporarily.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The facts are in the report before the Senate.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, this bill has been reported favorably. The beneficiary of the bill served an enlistment and was honorably discharged. He was separated from his wife after his honorable discharge, and she told him that she was going to get a divorce. He enlisted a second time, stating that he was single. As a matter of fact, that was strictly inaccurate and untrue, but the two had separated and he thought he was going to be divorced, and so he applied for enlistment as a single man. His wife then notified him that she was going to have a baby and that she had nobody to look out for her and she wanted to come back to him. Being in the Army, he said he would take care of her to such extent as his Army pay would permit, and she came and joined him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Let me finish. [Laughter.] Perhaps the Presiding Officer was anxious to know if there was objection to him joining his wife. At any rate, there was no objection to it, but the Army objected to his having enlisted with a statement that he was a single man. So he was court-martialed for that only. His service was creditable; he committed no military crime except the false statement which was made under the circumstances I have narrated when he enlisted. So he is prevented from having a pensionable status for the previous term of enlistment, from which he received an honorable discharge. The committee thought he ought to be afforded relief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which provides that in the administration of the pension laws or any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon persons honorably discharged from the United States Army, Thomas Johnsen shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged as a private, Battery C, Third Artillery, United States Army, on September 13, 1900, but no pension, pay, nor bounty shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANDREW B. RITTER

The bill (H. R. 3400) to correct the military record of Andrew B. Ritter was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. How about House bill 172, Order of Business 178?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That bill was passed a short time ago.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It has been passed already, on the request of the Senator from Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of House bill 3400?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE C. HUSSEY

The bill (H. R. 5994) for the relief of George C. Hussey was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, was that a case of desertion? I should like some explanation of it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It was a case of desertion after the war was over. This man served four years on the Union side, and was in the barracks here at Washington. He got into trouble with his superior officer through the commission of some minor offense, and, becoming impatient while under arrest, considering that the war was over and that he had performed his duty as a volunteer, he went back to his home without leave. In view of the fact that he had served four years, it seems to me that he is entitled to whatever privileges or rights would ordinarily have come to him by virtue of that service. He did not quit the service until several months after the war was over.

Mr. KING. I observe that the report of Maj. Gen. Robert C. Davis, the Adjutant General, in the concluding part of the report, uses this language:

Inasmuch as the records show that this soldier deserted while in confinement awaiting trial for breach of military duty, it will be seen that no relief can be extended in his case under existing law.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is true. That is as I stated it. He rendered good service throughout the war. This was a minor offense for which he was confined. It seemed to the committee that he was, in equity, entitled to recognition for the service he rendered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. I shall not object to its consideration, but I shall vote against it.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES CAUDWELL

The bill (S. 1736) for the relief of Charles Caudwell was announced as next in order.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 4, after the words "directed to," to strike out "settle the claim of" and insert "pay to," so as to read:

That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Charles Caudwell, Congleton, Cheshire, England.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, that is another one of the bills that provide that the Comptroller General shall make payments. There is nothing in the Office of the Comptroller General, as I understand, that qualifies him to make payments out of the Treasury. I ask that the bill go over until it can be scrutinized from that standpoint.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

CALVIN H. BURKHEAD

The bill (H. R. 4707) for the relief of Calvin H. Burkhead was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRACTICE OF ARCHITECTURE IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we revert to Order of Business 170, Senate bill 2660, which was passed over in my absence from the Chamber just a few moments ago at the request of the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent to return to Senate bill 2660. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2660) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the examination and registration of architects and to regulate the practice of architecture in the District of Columbia," approved December 13, 1924, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, with an amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, this is an important bill, apparently, and I think there ought to be an explanation of it, and also an explanation of the amendment. It is a 10-page bill.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, the bill is sent to us by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to correct certain inaccuracies in the act of 1924. The bill now before us was passed by both the Senate and House at the last session, but in slightly different form, and the Houses failed to get together. There was no objection to it at that time.

Probably the most important change is found in section 28, which provides for a right of appeal to the District Court of Appeals. The purpose of the bill is to set up a board of architects, and it requires registration of all architects. As far as we know, no one in the city is opposed to the measure, or any part of it. We had a hearing. We asked to have any one interested come before the committee and State objections. The bill was discussed in the newspapers of the city. There has been no objection of any kind. The District Commissioners have gone over it carefully. The corporation counsel, the legal department of the District, has considered it carefully, and it seems to be satisfactory in every respect.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I notice that there is at least one amendment proposed. What is the effect of that amendment?

Mr. CAPPER. The Senator will find on page 2 of the report the statement that section 16 of the existing law, according to the report made by the District Commissioners, is obscure, and in its practical application has given rise to much uncertainty, especially as section 29 relates to the same subject. The truth is the act of 1924 was carelessly drawn; and this bill is based on the experience of the past two years of this board of architects and will remove all of those ambiguities.

The report goes into detail as to the various changes suggested. As I said, one important thing is to provide the right of appeal on the part of any architect who might make objection to the findings of this board with which he is required to register. The bill is in line with the legislation that is found in pretty nearly every State in the Union in all the large cities having any considerable number of architects.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator states that this bill is to correct the results of carelessness and inefficiency in the preparation of a former bill which became law December 13, 1924. I note that on page 9 of the bill there is an amendment proposed by the committee striking out a penal provision as follows:

Any person who shall make any willfully false oath or affirmation in any matter or proceeding required or permitted by this act shall be deemed guilty of perjury and liable to the punishment therefor provided by the Code of Law for the District of Columbia.

Why that amendment?

Mr. CAPPER. That is explained in the third paragraph of the report, which says:

The effect of the amendment will be to remove the provision defining as perjury the making of a false oath in any matter or proceeding under the architects' practice act, as it is believed present laws of the District of Columbia are sufficient to cover such situations.

That was the judgment of the committee. The Senator from Washington went over the bill carefully so far as its legal provisions were concerned; and I will say again that the bill now before us passed this body a year ago, and passed the House, except that there were a few minor changes in verbiage; and the two Houses failed in the last days of the session to get together. This is really reenacting a bill that has already passed the House.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Kansas whether this bill makes it a misdemeanor or an offense for any person to act as his own architect in providing the plans for any building which he wants to construct?

Mr. CAPPER. I do not think it could possibly have that effect.

Mr. KING. While a man might be exceedingly unwise to be his own architect, as some men are their own lawyers with fatal results, nevertheless, if a man wanted to prepare plans for a garage or for some other building, and is willing to take the chances, I think the Government ought not to complain, and he ought not to be characterized as a felon.

Mr. CARAWAY. And you could not get any worse architect than the one who designed a theater down here in the District that collapsed and killed a hundred people.

Mr. KING. Yes; some of the architects have not a very creditable record.

Mr. CAPPER. The law has been in operation over two years so far as that provision is concerned, and no objection has been heard from any source.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the committee will be stated.

The amendment was, on page 9, line 12, after the word "counsel," to strike out: "Any person who shall make any willfully false oath or affirmation in any matter or proceeding required or permitted by this act shall be deemed guilty of perjury and liable to the punishment therefor provided by the Code of Law for the District of Columbia," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 14, 16, 19, 22, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, and 30 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the examination and registration of architects and to regulate the practice of architecture in the District of Columbia," approved December 13, 1924 (43 Stat. L. 714–718), be amended so that the same shall read as follows:

"SEC. 14. That, except as otherwise provided in this act, any person wishing to practice architecture in the District of Columbia under the title of architect shall, before being entitled to be or be known as an architect, secure from such board a certificate of qualifications to practice under the title of architect, as provided in this act."

"SEC. 16. That no person who was engaged in the practice of architecture in the District of Columbia on December 13, 1924, shall use or assume any title indicating that he or she is an architect, or any words, letters, or figures to indicate that the person using them is an architect, unless he or she shall have qualified and obtained a certificate of registration as an architect, or unless he or she shall, within six months after the passage of this act, file with said board an affidavit establishing to the satisfaction of said board the fact that he or she was in practice as an architect in said District on and prior to December 13, 1924. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any person who was engaged in the practice of architecture in said District on and prior to December 13, 1924, from applying to said board at any time for examination under this act. No firm shall be entitled to the style or designation 'architect' or 'registered architect' unless and until every member thereof shall be entitled to such designation. A corporation whose principal business, as shown by its charter, is the practice of architecture, may apply for and obtain a certificate of registration, provided all its executive officers and directors are registered architects. The same exemptions shall apply to partnerships and corporations as apply to individuals under this act."

"SEC. 19. That any properly qualified person who shall have been actually engaged in the practice of architecture in the District of Columbia on December 13, 1924, may be granted a certificate of registration without examination on condition that the applicant shall submit satisfactory evidence to the said board that he is qualified to practice architecture and by payment to the board of the fee required for certificate of registration as prescribed in section 23 of this act: Provided, That nothing in this act shall prevent any person who was actually engaged in the practice of architecture under the title of architect prior to December 13, 1924, from continuing the practice of said profession without a certificate of registration and without the use in any form of the title 'registered architect' upon filing the affidavit required by section 16 of this act."

"SEC. 22. That an architect who has lawfully practiced architecture for a period of more than 10 years outside of the District of Columbia shall, except as otherwise provided in subdivision (b) of section 21, be required to take only a practical examination, the nature of which shall be prescribed by the board of examiners and registrars of architects."

"SEC. 24. That all examination papers and other evidences of qualification submitted by each applicant shall be filed with the board of examiners and registrars of architects, and said board shall keep a record of its proceedings relating to the issuance, refusal, renewal, suspension, and revocation of certificates of registration.

"The record shall also contain the name, known place of business and residence, and the date and number of the certificate of registration of every registered architect entitled to practice his profession in the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 25. That every registered architect in the District of Columbia shall annually, during the month of May, renew his certificate of registration and pay the renewal fee required by section 23 of this act. Any such architect who fails to pay the said renewal fee shall cease to be a registered architect, subject to restoration upon paying the fee therefor prescribed in accordance with section 23 of this act.

"A person who fails to renew his certificate of registration during the month of May in each year may not thereafter renew his certificate except upon payment of the fee required by section 23 of this act for the restoration of an expired certificate of registration.

"Every renewal certificate shall expire on the 30th of April following the issuance.

"SEC. 26. Exemptions: That the following shall be exempted from the requirements of this act: (1) Any person practicing or desiring to practice architecture in the District of Columbia who shall have made application to the board for registration as an architect and who shall have paid the fee provided for in section 23 of this act, such exemption to continue only until the board shall have denied such application; (2) any officer or employee of the United States or the District of Columbia practicing architecture in that capacity alone.

"SEC. 27. Revocation of certificate: That the board of examiners and registrars of architects may revoke any certificate after 30 days' notice with grant of hearings to the holder thereof if proof satisfactory to the board be presented in the following cases:

"(a) In case it is shown that the certificate was obtained through fraud or misrepresentation.

"(b) In case the holder of the certificate has been found guilty by said board or by a court of justice of any fraud or deceit in his professional practice or has been convicted of a felony by a court of justice.

"(c) In case the holder of the certificate has been found guilty by said board of gross incompetency or of recklessness in the planning or construction of buildings.

"(d) In case a corporation holding a certificate of registration shall have as one of its executive officers or directors a person not a registered architect.

"SEC. 28. That the proceedings for the annulment of registration (that is, the revocation of a certificate) shall be begun by filing written charges against the accused with the board of examiners and registrars of architects by the board itself or by any complainant. A copy of the charges together with a notice of the time and place of hearing shall be served on the accused at least 30 calendar days in advance of such hearing, which shall be postponed if necessary to give the requisite notice. Where personal service can not be made within the District of Columbia, service may be made by publication or personal service in accordance with such rules as the board may adopt, following generally and in principle the provisions of sections 105 as amended, 106 and 108 of the Code of Laws of the District of Columbia. At the hearing the accused shall have the right to be represented by counsel, introduce evidence, and examine and cross-examine witnesses. The secretary of the board is hereby empowered to administer oaths. The board shall make a written report of its findings, which report, with a transcript of the entire record of the proceedings shall be filed with the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and if the board's findings shall be adverse to the accused his or her certificate of registration shall stand revoked and annulled, at the expiration of 30 days from the filing of such report, unless within said period of 30 days a writ of error shall be issued as hereinafter provided, in which event said certificate shall stand suspended until the final determination of the court of appeals upon such writ of error. If an exception is taken to any ruling of the board on matter of law, the exception shall be reduced to writing and stated in the bill of exceptions with so much of the evidence as may be material to the question or questions raised, and such bill of exceptions shall be settled by the board and signed by the secretary within such time as the rules of the board may prescribe. Any party aggrieved by the decision of the said board may seek a review thereof in the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia by petition under oath setting forth concisely but clearly and distinctly the nature of the proceeding before said board, the trial and determination thereof, and the particular ruling upon matter of law to which exception has been taken, said petition to be presented to any justice of the court of appeals within 30 days after the filing of the report of said board with the commissioners, with such notice to the board as may be required by the rules of the court of appeals. If the justices shall be of the opinion that the action of the board ought to be reviewed, a writ of error shall be issued from the court of appeals within such time as may be prescribed by that court, a transcript of the record in the case sought to be reviewed, and the court of appeals shall review said record and affirm, reverse, or modify the judgment in accordance with law."

Section 29 of the said act of December 13, 1924, is repealed. A new section, to be numbered section 29, is hereby enacted, as follows: "The said board shall have power to require the attendance of persons and the production of books and papers and to require such persons to testify in any and all matters within its jurisdiction. The chairman and the secretary of the board shall have power to issue subpœnas, and upon the failure of any person to attend as a witness when duly subpœnaed or to produce documents when duly directed by said board, the board shall have power to refer the said matter to any justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, who may order the attendance of such witness or the production of such books and papers or require the said witness to testify, as the case may be; and upon the failure of the witness to attend, to testify, or to produce such books or papers, as the case may be, such witness may be punished for contempt of court as for failure to obey a subpœna issued or to testify in a case pending before said court."

"SEC. 30. That any person who shall use the title 'architect' or 'registered architect' or any other words, letter, or figures indicating or intending to imply that the person using the same is an architect or a registered architect, without having complied with the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $200, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, prosecution therefor to be made in the name of the District of Columbia by the corporation counsel."

SEC. 2. That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to affect the force and validity of any act of the board of examiners and registrars of architects performed prior to its passage. The act of December 13, 1924, and this act may be cited and known as the architects' registration act.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think I will ask that this bill go over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

RADIO REGULATION

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I renew my request for unanimous consent to take up Order of Business 228, Senate bill 2317. I may say that we have had a conference regarding the radio commissioners, and it has been agreed that their nominations will be held up and not reported at this time, and I should like to take up this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of Senate bill 2317? The Chair hears no objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2317) continuing for one year the powers and authority of the Federal Radio Commission under the radio act of 1927, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with an amendment.

Mr. KING. Now, will the Senator make an explanation of the bill and its implications?

Mr. DILL. The purpose of this bill is to continue the original jurisdiction of the Radio Commission for one year. Under the present law the commission will end on March 15, 1928, as an original body and become an appellate body. The fact that the commission has not had any money, that it has not had any employees or instrumentalities with which to work, has greatly handicapped it. In addition to that, two of its members have died, one has resigned, and the commission has been in a very unsettled state. Because of that, the committee believes that another year of original jurisdiction should be given the commission. I may add that the problems in the short-wave-length allocations have become exceedingly numerous as compared with what they were a year ago.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. BLEASE. I presume Senators want to go on with their bills. I want to discuss this bill probably at some length. I have several matters here that I want to get into the RECORD on it.

Mr. DILL. Of course, I do not want to take up the time of the Senate, if the Senator takes that position.

Mr. BLEASE. It will take me at least half an hour.

Mr. DILL. I want to say to the Senator that the purpose of this bill is to limit the commissioners' powers and terms, of which I presume the Senator is in favor.

Mr. BLEASE. No; I am in favor of abolishing the commission.

Mr. DILL. If this bill is not passed, the commissioners will continue to hold office for six years instead of two, as before.

Mr. BLEASE. The more obnoxious it makes it to them, the better I will like it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KING. In view of the unanimous-consent agreement which was entered into some time ago, under which the Senate is now proceeding, would it be proper to submit another request asking unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill despite the limitations of debate under Rule VIII?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, in view of the fact that Senators generally understood that only bills to which there was no objection would be considered, it does not seem to me that that would be quite fair.

Mr. KING. Perhaps that would be unfair to absent Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the present agreement that can not be done.

Mr. DILL. If the Senator from South Carolina wants to take half an hour to talk about the bill, I do not want to hold up the Senate for the consideration of the measure.

Mr. PITTMAN. I take it that debate is limited under the rule, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We are considering only unobjected bills.

Mr. DILL. The consideration of this bill was not objected to, so that it would have to be considered under the five-minute rule, would it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DILL. Then, of course, if we are under the five-minute rule, I want to go ahead with the bill.

Mr. BLEASE. I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. DILL. But that time has passed. The Senate has agreed to consider it.

Mr. BLEASE. If so, it was without my knowledge. I was sitting right here at my desk, and I did not hear a request for the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the rules of the Senate, a Senator can object to the consideration of a bill at any stage.

Mr. BLEASE. I certainly would have objected if I had heard the request, and I object now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

FELIX MEDLER

The bill (S. 141) for the relief of Felix Medler was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill is reported adversely.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I ask that it be passed over.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. What about Order of Business 183, House bill 4707?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That bill has been passed. Senate bill 141 is reported adversely.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

NATIONAL SURETY CO.

The bill (S. 2335) for the relief of the National Surety Co. was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 5, to strike out "$157.98" and to insert in lieu thereof "$157.89."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will not the Senator in charge of the bill explain it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is not in the Chamber.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will ask that the bill go over for the day. I do not know that I will object to it, but I just want an explanation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

HEIRS OF RALPH K. WARRINGTON

The bill (H. R. 5300) for the relief of Lewis H. Francke and Blanche F. Shelley, sole legal heirs of Ralph K. Warrington, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full compensation against the Government, the sum of $3,092.63 to Lewis H. Francke and Blanche F. Shelley, of Louisville, Ky., the sole legal heirs of the late George A. Francke, who served as Ralph K. Warrington, formerly clerk, Medical Department at Large, United States Army, and who died intestate on March 1, 1919, for the loss of personal property belonging to the said deceased, through and by the theft and conversion at the hands of an employee of the Government of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FINAS M. WILLIAMS

The bill (H. R. 5228) for the relief of Finas M. Williams was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, Finas M. Williams shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the service of the United States Army on August 14, 1913: Provided, That no back pay, pension, or allowances shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSTRUCTION AT MILITARY POSTS

The bill (H. R. 7009) to authorize appropriations for construction at military posts, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING. I would like to have an explanation of the bill. It is a very important measure.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, it will not take any money out of the general appropriations, but is merely the application of the fund which was created under the act of Congress by the sale of surplus real estate belonging to the War Department. It applies that fund to the construction of barracks to correct the present housing deficiency in the Army. It is the third annual installment of this work of putting the housing of the Army on a proper basis. Congress has already passed two installments of the work in the last two years. It will not, as I have said, require any appropriation, but merely authorizes the application of the fund realized from the sale of the unnecessary land.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. KING. My recollection is that when Senator Wadsworth was chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs we authorized the sale of various parcels of land owned by the Government, as well as personal property, but my understanding was that the proceeds derived from the sales of either personal property or real estate were to be covered into the Treasury of the United States, and that if buildings were to be erected to house the officers and the men, direct appropriations would be required.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It requires the authority of Congress to take the money out of the Treasury.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as I understand the Senator, the amount that is authorized to be appropriated, $6,841,691, is the amount that has been realized this past year from that source.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It has not all been realized in the past year, but in the past two or three years.

Mr. McKELLAR. It has been realized from that source and covered into the Treasury.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Absolutely. I want to correct one matter. The proceeds from the sale of personal property by the Army, such as surplus uniforms, surplus materials, and things of that sort, have to be covered into the Treasury, and that is not a part of this fund. This is merely the application to real estate we now own—of the proceeds of the sale of real estate which we did not need and have sold. It will carry on, for one thing, the completion of the new primary flying school at San Antonio. Another thing, it will rebuild the barracks recently destroyed by fire at Fort Benjamin Harrison. Most of the money goes to the housing of the enlisted men. Very little is to be spent for officers.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, there is one item in the bill to which I object. I regret that it was not possible for me to be present when the bill was considered in the Committee on Military Affairs, of which I have the honor to be a member. On page 4, line 16, there is an item for the erection of a hydrogen gas holder at Scott Field, Ill., $49,500. I move to strike that out, and I should like to give my reasons for making the motion.

While I am a very strong believer in dirigibles for service over water, and I hope to see the day come within a year or less when we can have dirigibles crossing the Atlantic Ocean on passenger and mail service, and while I believe fully in the Navy's program for dirigibles, and shall be glad to see it expanded still further, I am entirely unconvinced of the necessity of the Army operating lighter-than-air craft over land. They can operate heavier-than-air craft at least three times as fast and much more efficiently, and more safely, and they can be operated in all kinds of weather when lighter-than-air craft can not be operated. It seems to me it is a waste of money to authorize appropriations or to appropriate for lighter-than-air craft in the Army. Therefore, I move that the item be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will not the Senator withhold his amendment until after the committee amendments have been disposed of?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments. The first amendment was, on page 1, line 4, to strike out "$4,283,716" and insert in lieu thereof "$6,841,691."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator why the House appropriation of $4,283,000 was increased by two and a half million dollars.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, it is not an appropriation; it is merely an authorization. It was increased to take care of the union of Kelly and Brooks Fields, with the new flying school at San Antonio. It authorizes the sale of Kelly and Brooks Fields as soon as the consolidation can be made. The net result will be a great saving to the Government, by the consolidation of those fields, and the economy in overhead that will result from it.

Then there has been an addition, which the Senator will see on page 5, for the completion of the hospital at Walter Reed, for the beginning of construction at West Point, and for the repair of the fire damage at Fort Benjamin Harrison, which was not taken into account by the House. All of this is within the Army's schedule for new construction. We have cut down the bill as it passed the House for the work at West Point by approximately a million and a half dollars. We consolidated the appropriations in that bill with this one, and have done nothing thus far on the other bill. This really represents a consolidation of the two bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee on page 1, line 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 7, after the word "hangars," to strike out "$316,000; hangars for airdrome gunnery and bombing range, $79,000" and insert "$440,000"; in line 10, after the words "field warehouse," to strike out "$38,000" and insert "$45,000"; in line 12, after the word "buildings," to strike out "$56,000" and insert "$61,000; school building, $40,000; gasoline and oil storage, $16,900; paint, oil, and dope storage, $5,000; night-flying lighting system, $15,000; improvement of landing field, $81,000"; in line 17, after the word "quarters," to strike out "$156,000; and" and insert "$540,000"; in line 18, after the figures "$1,020,000," to insert a semicolon and "hospital, $150,000; magazine (for explosives), $15,000; quartermaster warehouse, $90,000; garage, $80,000; quartermaster maintenance building, $20,000; fire house, $15,000; guardhouse, $30,000; post exchange, $45,000; theater and gymnasium, $60,000; incinerator, $5,000; railroad spur tracks, $39,700; telephone and telegraph lines in conduit, $68,375; bakery, $10,000; chapel and school, $50,000; enlisted men's club, $60,000; officers' mess, $60,000"; on page 4, line 16, after the figures "$6,861," to strike out "Scott Field, Ill., hydrogen gas holder, $49,500"; on page 5, line 6, after the figures "$400,000," to insert a semicolon and "Walter Reed General Hospital, in the District of Columbia, for the construction of a three-story ward building, for conversion of the fourth story of the present administration building of said hospital into an operating suite, including the construction of the necessary corridors, roads, walks, grading utilities, and appurtenances thereto, $310,000; the United States Military Academy, West Point, N. "There is hereby authorized to be constructed from current funds in possession of the Secretary of War, 96 sets of bachelor officers' quarters at Schofield Barracks, Hawaii, $108,000; an addition to ward building, Fort Sill, Okla., $30,000.

"The act entitled 'An act to authorize appropriations for construction at military posts, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1927, is hereby amended so as to strike out the authorization therein for $500,000 for barracks at Fort Benning, Ga., and to substitute therefor the following: 'For Fort Benning, Ga., barracks, $300,000; to complete the hospital and to construct nurses' quarters, $200,000,'" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $6,792,191, to be expended for the construction and installation at military posts of such technical buildings and utilities and appurtenances thereto as, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, may be necessary, as follows:

The amendments were agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], which the clerk will state.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, line 16, strike out the words "Scott Field, Ill., hydrogen gas holder, $49,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and request a conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees.

The motion was agreed to, and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. REED of Pennsylvania, Mr. GREENE, and Mr. FLETCHER conferees on the part of the Senate.

RECREATION PIER, SAN FRANCISCO

The bill (S. 1665) to authorize the board of park commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco to construct a recreation pier at the foot of Van Ness Avenue, San Francisco, Calif., was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized to grant a permit to the board of park commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco, Calif., to construct, maintain, and use a recreation pier in connection with the establishment of an aquatic park at the foot of Van Ness Avenue, San Francisco, Calif., and for such purpose to encroach upon the lands belonging to the United States and comprising a part of the Fort Mason Military Reservation.

SEC. 2. The permit shall be conditioned upon the relocation on a suitable site of the present wharf of the Army Transport Service, in such manner as may be determined by the Secretary of War, and without inconvenience or delay to the Army Transport Service, and shall be subject to such other terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War for the protection of the Fort Mason Military Reservation. The terms and conditions of such permit shall be performed without expense to the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOLDIERS' HOME, LOS ANGELES COUNTY, CALIF.

The bill (H. R. 164) to authorize appropriations for construction at the Pacific Branch, Soldiers' Home, Los Angeles County, Calif., and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES NEAL

The bill (H. R. 7553) for the relief of James Neal was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I wonder if that is a case of desertion. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

PAY OF IMMIGRATION OFFICERS

The bill (S. 2370) to amend section 24 of the immigration act of 1917 was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to explain the language in line 8 of the bill.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That was intended, Mr. President, to take care of a few of the chief inspectors. I take it that the amount named in the bill would not be greatly in excess of $3,000. But that language is not necessary. If there is objection to it, I would be glad to have it stricken out rather than to see the bill fail.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the salaries ought to be fixed.

Mr. KING. I would like to look into this bill a little.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. May I ask the Senator to study the table on the last page of the report? I think the Senator will be convinced that these people are receiving less than any other class of skilled workers employed by the United States Government.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have no objection to the bill and think that it should pass, but it seems to me that that is strange language to employ.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill may go over.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that by the time the bill is called up again he shall propose a proper salary for the class in grade 6?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I think the objection is well taken, and I shall try to prepare such an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over under objection.

FREDERICK N. CARR

The bill (S. 43) for the relief of Frederick N. Carr, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Frederick N. Carr, who was a second lieutenant in Company I, First Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as an officer of said company and regiment on the 4th day of February, 1899: Provided, That no pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will withhold his objection.

Mr. KING. I withhold the objection.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, this is an extraordinarily meritorious measure. Fred N. Carr, whose record it is intended to correct, was, to my personal knowledge, a brave and a patriotic soldier. The infirmity of his discharge is the result of Mr. Carr's having generously assumed obligations for his friends in excess of his ability to pay.

Justice demands that this bill be passed.

Consequently, I urge the able Senator from Utah to withdraw the objection to its consideration which he has interposed.

Mr. KING. I withdraw the objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROBERT F. YEAMAN

The bill (H. R. 4777) to compensate Robert F. Yeaman for the loss of certain carpenter tools which was incurred by reason of a fire in the Government area at Old Hickory Ordnance Depot was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Robert F. Yeaman, out of any money not otherwise appropriated and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $217.70, the value in full of carpenter tools belonging to the said Yeaman and which were destroyed by fire in the Government area at Old Hickory Depot on the 4th day of August, 1924.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPHINE THIBODEAUX

The bill (H. R. 8369) for the relief of Josephine Thibodeaux was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,000 to Josephine Thibodeaux, of Los Angeles, Calif., which sum was paid by her to the United States as a bail bond for appearance in court of N. H. Thibodeaux, said bail bond being declared forfeited by the court for nonappearance, but subsequently ordered paid back to said Josephine Thibodeaux through an order of said court vacating the forfeiture of the bail bond, but which amount had been covered into the Treasury of the United States by the clerk of the court.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETER S. KELLY

The bill (S. 1771) for the relief of Peter S. Kelly was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws conferring rights and privileges upon honorably discharged soldiers, their widows, and dependent relatives, Peter S. Kelly, late of Company B, First Regiment Montana Volunteer Infantry, shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of the above organization on the 17th day of October, 1899: Provided, That no pay, pension, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS M. ROSS

DANIEL F. ROBERTS

The bill (S. 46) for the relief of Daniel F. Roberts was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Daniel F. Roberts, who was a private in Company D, Second Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment on the 10th day of April, 1899: Provided, That no pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to have an explanation for the great number of such bills.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, it is easily explained. The House of Representatives sent over to us, almost at the beginning of the session, about 100 of such bills. They were all bills which had passed the House, some of them several times, but had not been acted on over here. They were all referred to subcommittees along with several hundred Senate bills. We have reported out perhaps 15 bills from the Military Affairs Committee, and that is not 5 per cent of the bills which have been pending. Those which were reported affirmatively seemed to the committee to be very meritorious cases, and many of them have passed the Senate before.

Mr. KING. I notice the report states "service not honest and faithful."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. To which one does the Senator now refer?

Mr. KING. Calendar No. 200, Senate bill 46. My eye happened to rest upon that sentence. There may be many exculpatory provisions or explanatory remarks which qualify that sentence.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The reason why those words were put on his discharge was that after the Spanish war was over, after good service in the Army during the Spanish war, he got into a row with the chief cook of his company, as soldiers frequently do, and especially as they did in those days when the ration was none too good. He had a fist fight with the chief cook and was court-martialed for it. That was the only incident brought to our attention to show that his service was not honest and faithful.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRINTING OF LAWS, ETC., RELATING TO INDIAN AFFAIRS

The resolution (S. Res. 115) to print the manuscript of the laws, agreements, Executive orders, and proclamations relating to Indian affairs was announced as next in order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I desire to say that I was unable to include in the report of the committee the estimate of the Public Printer as to the cost of this printing. I am now informed that it is estimated to cost $8,589.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not want to object to the passage of the resolution and yet I invite the attention of the Senator to the fact that a few days ago a resolution was passed by the Senate authorizing and requiring the Committee on Indian Affairs, by subcommittee or otherwise, to make a comprehensive study of the Indian laws and regulations, and the general conduct of the Government in dealing with the Indians, to study in a comprehensive and constructive way the manner in which we have dealt with the Indians, with a view to recommending back to Congress legislation, if they deem legislation necessary, for the benefit of the Indians and which will contribute more to their advancement and civilization. That committee will be authorized to study these laws and to report, of course, amendments.

I was wondering whether it might not be wise to postpone the operation of this measure until that committee reports?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut permit me to make a statement?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The resolution proposes to authorize the printing of an additional volume of a compilation of the Indian laws and treaties, which has been in progress since 1902. The volumes thus far printed form an exceptionally valuable compilation. As a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I express it as my own personal opinion that it would be of great service to the Committee on Indian Affairs to have the latter volume printed. I feel absolutely sure that it will be of great service to every Member of the Senate and the House who has any occasion to consider Indian legislation. I sincerely hope that the resolution will pass.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript of the laws, agreements, Executive orders, proclamations, etc., relating to Indian affairs, prepared under Senate Resolution 57, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session, be printed as a Senate document, and that 50 additional copies be printed for the use of the Indian Office and Indian agencies.

APPOINTMENT OF PROVINCE GOVERNORS, PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

The bill (S. 2787) providing for the appointment of governors of the non-Christian Provinces in the Philippine Islands by the governor general without consent of the Philippine Senate was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let the bill go over.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, there are several Senators who desire to make statements upon the bill, particularly the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], who is not now ready to speak, so I ask that the bill may go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Te bill will be passed over.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, what does the Senator mean by "go over without prejudice"? I want it to go over so far as this particular call is concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words "without prejudice" mean nothing under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is all right if the President pro tempore shall remain in the chair.

Mr. WILLIS. It does not make any difference whether the President pro tempore remains in the chair or not; the Senator ought to understand that that is a phrase used here and that it means absolutely nothing so far as that is concerned. The bill goes over under the rule, and it went over at my request and not at the request of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Very well; it makes no difference to me so long as the bill is not considered.

Mr. WILLIS. It will be considered in due time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The President pro tempore still agrees with both Senators.

SEC. 4. The work of copy reading and index making for this publication shall be done by the regular editorial staff of the Department of State, and the cost of this work—prorated each month according to the number of hours spent and the annual salaries of the clerks employed—shall be charged against such annual appropriations as may be made under the provisions of section 3.

The amendments were agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION WORK

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to revert to Calendar No. 76, being the bill S. 1285, for the purpose of submitting a few remarks on that measure, which provides for further development of cooperative extension work in agriculture and home economics.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1285) to provide for the further development of agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of the act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, and all acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture.

Mr. CAPPER. This bill provides for the further development of the cooperative extension work in agriculture and home economics with men, women, boys, and girls inaugurated under the Smith-Lever Act passed May 8, 1914. The bill is in conformity with the plans of the United States Department of Agriculture and the land-grant colleges for completing the cooperative extension system. The Smith-Lever Act and this measure provide for the putting into practical operation of a permanent national policy for our basic industry—agriculture.

There is an urgent demand from the entire country for the further development of extension work in agriculture and home economics.

Mr. President, agricultural progress and the welfare of those engaged in it have long been recognized as a public matter. Under Article I, section 8, of the Constitution, which gives Congress the power to provide for the "general welfare of the United States," there has been considerable legislation on agriculture and home economics. These legislative acts have been especially appropriate because they have to do with basic vocations, the status of which affects the welfare of the people.

The United States Department of Agriculture was established in 1862 and given a post in the Cabinet in 1889. The first Morrill Act, passed July 2, 1862, donated public lands to the several States and Territories which might provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts. It should be borne in mind that the Department of Agriculture was established and the first Morrill Act passed when the county was in the grip of civil war. In time of war the Members of Congress were making preparation for a larger educational opportunity for rural people and a lasting peace.

Again in 1890 the Federal Congress passed the second Morrill Act to apply a portion of the proceeds of the sale of public lands to the more complete endowment and support of the colleges for the benefit of agriculture and mechanic arts, established under the provisions of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862.

The Nelson amendment to the appropriation act for the United States Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, made a direct appropriation to support further and to develop the land-grant colleges.

Military training was required in the land-grant colleges under the original Morrill Act.

It is rather simple to provide buildings and instructors to teach agriculture and mechanic arts, but it is a more difficult matter to provide something to teach. These colleges established under the original Morrill Act found that the information and scientific facts available were very limited and of doubtful value.

In 1887 the Federal Congress passed the Hatch Act to establish experiment stations in connection with the land-grant colleges, and to provide Federal aid for their operation.

The work of the experiment stations and the land-grant colleges grew, and the results obtained justified a further addition to the appropriation for the experiment stations. Increased appropriations for the experiment stations were made under the Adams Act, approved March 16, 1906, and under the Purnell Act, approved February 24, 1925. For 40 years the investigational work in the field of agriculture and home economics has been moving at a rapid pace.

The land-grant colleges have grown in enrollment and effectiveness as the results of the experiment stations have been made available to the teaching staff. Paralleling the growth of the experiment stations and the land-grant colleges, the United States Department of Agriculture has increased its experimental work and added the results to those obtained by the stations at the land-grant colleges. Chapters could be written on the beneficial and positive effect on the public welfare that has resulted from the establishment of the land grant colleges and experiment stations.

PRACTICAL APPLICATION OF SCIENCE TO AGRICULTURE

Crops, livestock, and soil have been thoroughly investigated, and scientific facts have been developed. Economic questions have been studied, and the principles have been applied to cooperative marketing. The work has been so thoroughly done that it has proved practical and successful when applied to the everyday farm operations. The application of the work of the experiment stations in the South to the farms as a whole took a serious turn in 1904, when the cotton boll weevil invaded Texas. There was an insistent demand for scientific information that would help the farmers to meet the emergency. Scientific agriculture came out of the laboratory and classroom and became the tool of the rural people. At first a few men were employed to live among the farmers and teach them by practical demonstrations what science had found in the test tube and the test plot. Congress made a small appropriation for farmers' cooperative demonstrations in the boll-weevil area. The work was so successful that it long since spread into all the States.

In the Northern States, Mr. President, the investigational work in the experiment stations was very successful. No immediate calamity like the boll weevil forced the farmers to turn their attention to the agricultural colleges. At first a few experiment-station workers went out into the State to tell the farmer groups what had been found that was of interest to them. The demand for the results of research were so insistent that other means had to be found to meet the demand of the farmers. For at least 10 years, between 1900 and 1910, the farmers' institute movement flourished in the Northern States. Aggressive States like Iowa established an extension service at the agricultural college as early as 1900. The practice of employing a trained man or woman in a county to demonstrate the practices developed by the United States Department of Agriculture and the experiment station was a natural outgrowth.

Again the Federal Congress passed legislation to meet the need. The Smith-Lever Act was approved May 8, 1914. It provided for an initial allotment of $10,000 to each State, an additional sum of $600,000 the following year, and an increase of $500,000 each year thereafter for seven years. This fund was apportioned to the States on the basis of rural population and was to be offset by an equal amount of funds procured from within the States.

The Smith-Lever Act was significant legislation, because it provided for a systematic increase of funds for extension work. It enabled the administrative officers to do effective planning. It prevented waste of public funds and, most important of all, it provided for practical cooperation between the United States Department of Agriculture and the land-grant colleges in the extension work. It eliminated duplication of effort and conflict. The act provided for a comprehensive system of education for farmers and their families in agriculture and home economics through useful, practical demonstrations under ordinary farm conditions.

DEVELOPMENT OF AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION WORK

The experiment stations and the colleges ceased to be things separate and apart from the farm itself. The Smith-Lever Act brought about a situation where farmers and college men were working shoulder to shoulder on common problems, each contributing his part to the solution of vexing problems of agriculture and home life. This contact with the farming people brought the experiment stations nearer to the farm problems. A comparison of the extension work of county agricultural agents in 1914 with that of 1924 is in a report to the Department of Agriculture. I ask unanimous consent that a quotation from that report may be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE TYPICAL COUNTY AGRICULTURAL AGENT IN 1914

On July 1, 1914, 718 counties in the 15 Southern States and 210 in the remaining States in the North and West had agents. Seven States had no county agricultural agents and only two had a full quota. The average annual salary was less than $1,200, and out of this the county agricultural agent paid his own expenses. He was a mature man about 40 years old, who frequently lived on his own farm and who devoted about 10 months out of each year to the work. His office was his own home. He had no stenographer, no typewriter, and wrote his letters and reports in longhand.

He traveled about his county by horse and buggy, on horseback, or even on foot. He left his home on Monday morning and returned again Saturday night. During the week he followed the road, visiting and talking to farmers, inspecting demonstrations, and arranging for new ones. He lived with the farmers, staying overnight where night overtook him. Often he managed his trip so as to stay with his "key men" or those whose support he desired to win. His day was the farmer's day plus. He helped the farmer to do the evening chores and after hours he talked with the farmer long after the children had been put to bed and while the farm wife dozed by the fire. Often there would be company and a home meeting would be held.

The agent carried improved seed and demonstration equipment with him. He was truly an itinerant teacher. He was an outstanding man in the community in which he lived, with the qualities of leadership, broad human sympathy, and the spirit of an apostle. By modern standards his work seems crude and ineffective, but he was a pioneer and, like the pioneer farmer, he met conditions as he found them, and under those conditions and with those handicaps he did a great work and did it well.

THE TYPICAL COUNTY AGRICULTURAL AGENT IN 1924

On July 1, 1924, 2,084 counties had agents. All States had county agricultural agents and five States had a full quota. The average salary was $2,700, and the average amount provided for expenses about $1,200 additional.

The average county agricultural agent is an agricultural college graduate with practical farm experience and is about 30 years of age and married. He devotes 12 months to the service. He has a "downtown" office with adequate files, telephone, and office conveniences. He has a stenographer and maintains regular office days to accommodate the increasing number of persons who come to him for advice.

He devotes approximately 60 per cent of his time to the field and 40 per cent to the office. He has an advisory council or group of farmers with whom he develops a program and through whom he arranges his demonstrations.

He travels in an automobile and usually returns home every night—sometimes late. He works less with the individual and more with groups. The extension program is less his program and more an expression of the people's desires in regard to what ought to be done.

He still works long hours, and, in spite of modern conveniences, has a job full of hard work. He is still an itinerant teacher, but is more the efficiency agricultural engineer. He still needs to be resourceful and has to meet unusual and unexpected conditions, but his work is better planned. He is less a personal apostle with a message and more the representative of the State college of agriculture and the United States Department of Agriculture. He is less an opportunist and more an analyst, who helps the farmer to determine what is best, demonstrates better practices, and advertises the results. His advance from the pioneer type has been rapid. It is due partly to mechanical conveniences and organization, partly to better training, but primarily to better understanding and cooperation by the farmers, which are in themselves the best fruits of extension work.

The growth of the county agricultural agent work in the United States is shown in the following chart copied from the United States Department of Agriculture Miscellaneous Circular 59.

ALL FARMING SECTIONS NOT EQUALLY BENEFITED

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, it should be noted that the original Smith-Lever Act was passed in 1914 immediately before the outbreak of the World War in Europe and that the cost of labor and travel entering into extension work increased as did other things. If conditions had remained the same as they were when the Smith-Lever Act was passed, it is probable that the entire system could have been completed with the funds provided. We are confronted now with the fact that we have an incomplete organization with well-developed extension work in some counties and little or no extension work in others. The unfairness can not continue. As a nation, we must provide equal opportunity for the farmer and his family whether he lives in a dry area in the West or in the Ozark Mountains or in the densely populated prairie lands of the Mississippi Valley.

It is not surprising that some inequalities should have been found in a new piece of legislation like the Smith-Lever Act. Distribution of appropriations on the basis of rural population is about as fair a basis as could be suggested, but the sparse population and great distances in the West and the small number of farms outside of organized villages in the East have given the West and the East a small amount of money for extension work. We are now in a position where we can look backward and survey the progress and plan for the completion of the extension system.

The present bill is the result of the combined effort of the United States Department of Agriculture, the land-grant colleges, the farm organizations, business organizations, women's organizations, and civic groups. In fact, all organizations that should be interested in extension work have expressed themselves as favorable to the bill. There are some minor changes in the bill from the original Smith-Lever Act.

The original allotment without offset has been increased from $10,000 to $20,000 to care more equitably for the Western and Eastern States as mentioned heretofore. The authorization is increased $500,000 each year for 12 years instead of 7 years as in the original act. The period of 12 years seems to be sufficient to develop and to expand the extension system in an orderly manner. The bill provides that 80 per cent of the funds shall be spent for salaries within the counties. This provision was inserted to insure that every county would be supplied with a sufficient number of agents to direct the work with men, women, boys, and girls. The bill also provides that the funds shall be used to employ men and women agents in fair and just proportions. This provision was inserted to insure the employment of an adequate number of trained women to develop and to carry on a well-rounded extension program.

The original Smith-Lever Act prohibited the participation of extension employees in agricultural trains. The new act permits the administrative director to exercise his judgment regarding this matter.

STATE PARTICIPATION IN EXTENSION WORK

The situation is this: The Smith-Lever Act matured in 1923. The intent of the act was carried out as far as funds would permit. At the present time the Federal Government is contributing $6,830,000, and the State and local agencies are contributing $13,500,000. The States are now contributing $1.94 for every dollar that the Government is appropriating for extension work. The funds obtained within the States come from three sources. The counties appropriate 45 per cent and the State legislatures 46 per cent. The farm organizations contribute 9 per cent. Attention is called to the fact that the States have not only met the requirements of the Smith-Lever Act by meeting the Federal appropriations on a dollar-for-dollar basis but they have contributed to this work nearly twice the amount required in the act.

Records obtained from the United States Department of Agriculture show that funds now used for extension work are apportioned about as follows:

Administration	$866,782
Publications	249,477
Extension specialists	4,095,795
County extension work	15,185,506
Total	20,397,560

The budget shows that 74.5 per cent of all funds is expended for county extension work and that the expenditures within the counties are allotted as follows:

County agricultural agents	$9,488,647
Home demonstration agents	2,830,071
Boys and girls' club work	573,747

They have, with the funds available, employed 2,263 white county agricultural agents, 903 white home demonstration agents, 156 county club agents, and 274 negro agents. The question has often been asked, "Will the States complete the extension system if the Federal Government does not increase its appropriations?" A study of the records since the maturity of the Smith-Lever Act in 1923 shows that there has been a slight increase in the number of county extension agents employed. In 1923 there were 3,419 county extension agents employed, while in 1927 there were 3,596—an increase of 177 agents in four years. This is altogether too slow. The new bill will provide for a complete system. Little progress has been made since the maturity of the Smith-Lever Act in completing the extension system. There are 700 counties without county agricultural agents. There are 1,900 counties without home demonstration agents, and there are 1,650 counties without adequate leadership and direction for our farm boys and girls. The purpose of this bill is to supply sufficient funds to complete the extension system by increasing the funds each year for 13 years. There can be no question as to the advisability of completing the extension organization along the lines laid down in this bill. It has the unqualified approval of every agency concerned. It follows the plan that has been in operation under the Smith-Lever Act for 13 years. It has proved successful under test. The bill is sufficiently elastic to meet the conditions as they exist in the States. In the South, where only home demonstration agents and county agricultural agents are employed, the work will be expanded to care for the boys and girls by the addition of assistant county agricultural agents and assistant county home demonstration agents. In the North, where boys' and girls' club agents are employed, the club agents can be introduced into counties as rapidly as the people demand them and the funds are available.

County agricultural agents are employed in approximately 2,100 counties. There are about 700 counties which do not have the services of agents to advise with them regarding their problems of production and marketing. I hold that it is obvious that one-quarter of the counties are laboring under an unusual handicap because they do not have an agent to bring them the results of experimental work. Let me cite a typical illustration from my own home State of Kansas.

PRACTICAL VALUE OF SERVICE TO THE FARMER

In 1918 Shawnee County began through its farm bureau, its county agricultural agent, and the extension service a systematic compaign to utilize improved methods in potato production in the Kaw Valley. Results of this program are shown in the following tables comparing the yield in Shawnee County with that in Pottawatomie County, which did not undertake an organized program in this respect, and has not done so up to the present time. The tables given are compiled from the statistics of the State board of agriculture. I ask unanimous consent that the tables may be incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The tables referred to are as follows:

Average annual income, 1918–1924	$73,781.28

Mr. CAPPER. It will be observed in this table that Shawnee County during the period 1910–1917, or those eight years prior to the adoption of its improvement program, grew an average annual acreage of 1,846, and had an average annual yield of 91.9 bushels per acre. During this same period of time Pottawatomie County had an average annual acreage of 1,159 and an average annual yield of 72.7 bushels per acre.

Shawnee County, after extension work began in 1917, increased its acreage, until in 1924 it grew 5,887 acres, whereas Pottawatomie County, in this same period, declined to 761 acres.

Shawnee County, during the period of 1918–1924, had an average acreage of 3,907, or an increase of 111.1 per cent over the period 1910–1917. Its yield increased from 91.9 in the period 1910–1917 to 122.6 in 1918–1924, or an average annual increase of 33.4 per cent.

Pottawatomie County, during the period 1918–1924, decreased its acreage until in 1924 it was growing only 761 acres, a decrease of 59.2 per cent in comparison to the period 1910–1917. This county grew an average annual acreage of 881 during the later period, a decrease of 109.5 per cent, as against Shawnee County's increase of 111.1 per cent.

Pottawatomie County's yield per acre increased from 72.7 bushels per acre in the period 1910–1917 to 74.8 bushels per acre in 1918–1924, an increase of only 2.8 per cent in comparison with Shawnee County's increase of 33.4 per cent.

The probable net increase in income to Shawnee County for the period 1918–1924, resulting from the improvement campaign, may be estimated at more than $1,900,000.

Another illustration from my home State: A study of the agriculture of Edwards and Pawnee Counties, which are similar in soils, adjoin each other, and are both crossed by the Arkansas River, reveals in a striking manner the value of a systematic agricultural program carried out by a well-organized farm bureau and a good county agent. The agricultural statistics collected by the State board of agriculture enable us with a satisfactory degree of accuracy to measure the relative progress of the agriculture of the two counties.

A comparison was made of the value of all farm crops and of wheat and corn yields for the seven-year period before and the seven-year period after the installation of a county agent in Pawnee County. Some striking contrasts appear.

The area under cultivation in each county increased nearly the same during the period—6 per cent in Pawnee County and 7 per cent in Edwards County.

The value of all crops in Edwards County during the earlier period was $16,572,090, and in the later period $21,238,870, an increase of $4,666,780. This shows an increase of 28 per cent, as compared to a 54 per cent gain in Pawnee County.

Pawnee County's percentage increase in value of all crops was almost twice that of Edwards County, and it must be remembered that the increase in area of both counties was the same. Pawnee County's total dollar increase over Edwards County was $8,483,252, or $1,211,893 per year.

A study of acre yields of crops in the two counties will indicate the reason for this difference in agricultural income.

Pawnee County (with an agent) increased its yield of wheat 2½ bushels per acre over the production in Edwards County (without an agent) during this period, and its corn yield by 3.2 bushels per acre.

These increases in yields account for the major part of the increase in total gain in income from farm crops in Pawnee County (with an agent) as compared to Edwards County (without an agent).

These figures would seem to indicate clearly that the agricultural extension programs carried on in Pawnee County by the farm bureau and the county agent, with the cooperation of the agricultural college, have borne good fruit. The results have now reached a point where they average more than $1,000,000 per year. This is an interesting light upon the problem of making the farm pay during these difficult times.

HOME-DEMONSTRATION WORK

Mr. President, home-demonstration work to date has rendered a service to farm women and girls which has brought about economic contribution, home-making efficiency, and social satisfaction in farm homes in every State. One million farm homes were reached by home-demonstration work during 1926.

Results achieved include increased physical well-being, additional income for family needs, more efficiency in carrying on essential home tasks, greater comfort and beauty within the farm home, attractive surroundings for it, and constructive use of leisure hours. Satisfying community life has been an objective of home-demonstration work, and the activities of agents have added to the physical and social well-being of the community as a whole and aided the beautification of the rural community.

By far the most important achievement has been the discovery and development of leadership among farm women which has been actively expressed through their participation in and contribution to all types of worth-while endeavors for the farm, the farm home, and the farming community.

Home-demonstration work as a part of the cooperative-extension service began as tomato-canning club work for girls in South Carolina in 1910. It was recognized by those endeavoring to combat the ravages of the boll weevil that not only the farm, but the farm home must be made satisfactory; and the farm woman as well as the farmer must have high standards and challenging objectives if agriculture was to be efficient and to retain the loyalty of a high type of citizenship.

The early growth of home-demonstration work was remarkable. In 1910 there were but four county home-demonstration agents. The work with adult women began in 1913. By 1918, when the war-time program was at its height, there were 1,715 county home-demonstration agents teaching rural women and girls the basic facts of food and clothing conservation. With the withdrawal of the emergency appropriations the number was reduced to 699 in 1921. Since that period there has been a gradual increase, but this has been hampered by lack of adequate Federal funds.

There are 3,064 agricultural counties in the United States, 2,379 of which have 1,000 or more farms. During 1926 but 816 counties had full-time white home-demonstration agents. There were 108 negro home-demonstration agents.

So insistent were the requests for home-demonstrotion work by women in counties where funds were not available for full-time service that plans were evolved for part-time service, and 60 white home-demonstration agents carried on home-demonstration work in two or more counties during 1926. In addition to the above requests for home-demonstration work women in large numbers recognized the need of this service but lived in counties where funds were not available, or where other reasons existed which prevented the employment of a full-time home-demonstration agent. In 777 such counties a small extent of home-demonstration work was conducted by home-economics specialists as an indication of the far greater service that might be rendered were funds available for a full-time county home-demonstration agent.

In addition to the county home-demonstration agents, the home-demonstration staff of 1926 consisted of 46 State home-demonstration agents, 83 assistant State home-demonstration agents, and 160 home-economics specialists.

As evidence of the effectiveness of home-demonstration agents, during the last year 469,465 farm women conducted sustained demonstrations of desirable farm-home practices, 188,595 farm girls were helped to conduct demonstrations in some phase of farm-home making, and 12,465 farm boys to conduct demonstrations contributing to greater satisfaction in the rural home.

DEMAND FOR MORE HOME-DEMONSTRATION WORK

Although the utilization by farm women of this educational service has rapidly increased from year to year the work has been greatly hampered in its expansion by insufficient funds.

During 1926 the State leaders of home-demonstration work from Georgia, Kansas, Texas, and North Carolina reported that 29 counties had made the required county appropriations for home-demonstration agents and were on the waiting list ready to add home-demonstration agents when Federal and State funds were available. The North Carolina State agent reported:

> For five years the number of counties in home-demonstration work has remained practically stationary owing to the static condition of State and Federal appropriations. Counties asking for home-demonstration work have not been supplied on account of lack of State and Federal funds with which to meet their appropriations. Nine such counties have asked for organization.

The Kansas State home-demonstration leader reported eight counties on the waiting list. Texas reported seven counties waiting, five of which had appropriated $1,500, and two $1,200 each. The Georgia State agent reported:

> Five counties are on the waiting list for home-demonstration agents as soon as State and Federal funds are available.

The Minnesota State leader wrote:

> Interest in obtaining a home-demonstration agent is keen and the attitude good in several counties, but with the present State and Federal appropriations no increase in the budget is possible.

The Iowa State leader reported:

> Lack of funds to support two agents adequately is the problem to be solved in some way.

The Wyoming State leader indicated that additional counties would probably be available if funds from State and Federal sources were obtainable.

Mr. President, despite the difficulties which confront it home-demonstration work is slowly but surely being recognized as a basic factor in agricultural well-being. Kentucky reported that during 1926 several counties made three-year appropriations for home-demonstration work. The State agent from Georgia reported:

> In the 63 counties with home-demonstration agents renewal appropriations were promptly granted.

The State agent from Tennessee reported:

> In practically every county there was more support of appropriations for home-demonstration work than ever before.

Maryland reported:

> County commissioners have responded favorably to requests made for the support of home-demonstration work.

Illinois reported:

> One of the encouraging features of the financial program this year was the greater knowledge and interest which the women have concerning this phase of the work. Each county has a finance committee.

New York reported that in the majority of counties the local women have assumed entire responsibility for the detailed county budget for home-demonstration work.

Vermont reported:

> The women have given more thought to and have assumed more responsibility for county funds for home-demonstration work.

VALUE OF THE SERVICE TO FARM WOMEN

That home-demonstration work is meeting a vital need is indicated by the volume of unpaid volunteer service which is being given to its development and further expansion by farm women. During 1926, 126,709 farm women gave an average of 12 days' time per woman in helping to plan the program, in extending the information to women already in organized groups, and in interesting additional women to join the groups for the purpose of receiving the information.

That farm women recognize the value of having a full-time county home-demonstration agent is indicated by the following excerpts from comments made by some Iowa farm women, as reported by the Iowa State home-demonstration leader:

The only thing lacking in home-demonstration service is that not enough counties have agents. It is up to the "believers" to sell home-demonstration-agent service so that more counties will make that their goal.

Because of the progress women and girls have made they deserve a leader who understands the conditions and needs of all the county.

My work has proved to my own satisfaction that a home-demonstration agent pays, and pays big, not only for the sake of project work but that it brings about that understanding of the necessity of organization for agriculture.

The home-demonstration agent cooperates with or interests business men, bankers, doctors, nurses, librarians, and others. She sells the job to them, and thus strengthens our work.

The home-demonstration agent helps make definite and well-balanced project programs.

The home-demonstration agent gives all her time to her work; even the best of volunteer county project leaders can not possibly give the time and thought these important projects require.

The home-demonstration agents apply their technical training to the home makers' practical training, thus making housekeeping and home making easier, more practical, and more economical.

They keep up on new home-economics movements and pass them on to their farm women and girls.

Project work can be conducted on a more intensive basis, thus giving the women more help and help to more women.

The home-demonstration agent injects new ideas into work each year and interests girls and women in carrying them out.

Mr. President, results of home-demonstration work have included every field of well-being for the farm family. The farm family is better housed, fed, and clothed. Standards of positive health and how to obtain it and to prevent illness have been taught to and achieved by them.

Available income has been utilized economically, and home-demonstration activities in home crafts, gardening, poultry, and dairying activities have supplemented the income from farm crops and stock. Household tasks have been accomplished in a minimum of time and with the assurance of satisfactory results, and the time thus saved has been used for enriching family life and neighborly hospitality. Homes have been beautified indoors and out.

In this time of economic stress among farm people, instances have been reported where farm crops failed and the farm woman, through the aid of home-demonstration work, was enabled to earn enough money from her poultry to provide food and clothing for the family.

Home-demonstration work also has contributed to improved rural-community life. Hot school lunches, community recreation, beautified highways and public grounds, community houses, wholesome recreation at county fairs, improved fair exhibits, are some of the results of home-demonstration work.

Not only have tangible economic and physical improvements been made as a result of home-demonstration work, but there have been other values which can not be measured, but which have made rich contribution to rural life. Some of these less tangible results include the development of a consciousness of the positive values in rural life; pride in the rural community; consciousness of the importance of a worth-while home; joint family effort toward a given objective in work and in play; capable leadership among farm women in analyzing rural needs and in planning ways and means to obtain such needs; neighborly cooperation replacing individualism and suspicion; knowledge and constructive effort replacing old-time apathy, misinformation, and prejudice; enlarged horizon resulting in enlarged interests in toleration of the point of view of others and in a desire to be more efficient; recognition of responsibility to the community and willingness to make a contribution of one's time and effort for the good of all; social satisfaction arising from contacts made during home-demonstration meetings and during community recreational affairs conducted by them.

FARM WOMEN GREATLY INTERESTED

Evidence of the broadened interest of farm women due to home-demonstration work is indicated by the following quotations from farm women in various States:

A new era dawned for the farm woman when the home-demonstration work came to her rescue to brighten her pathway and make life on the farm so much more worth while. It develops a community spirit, the value of which can scarcely be estimated. It develops the farm woman's latent abilities and enables her to be a local leader, which is an education in itself, to preside at meeting or work in various ways for the good of the home and the community—a task which before this work was started she would have thought altogether impossible for her to perform.

Although the project work has been most valuable, if extension work has done nothing else it has been of untold value when it developed the community spirit and called the people together to enjoy each other's society, to help to solve their problems, and make this old earth a better place in which to live.

I have improved my home because I have been led to inspect it carefully and to correct the weak points in my management.

I have improved the health of my family by learning tactful ways to interest them in the use of whole grains, more milk, more vegetables, less meat, less sugar.

It has opened to me the vast possibilities in the future for agriculture.

It has aided me to be more helpful to my husband and two little boys by making our home more cheery and attractive.

It has been a very great aid to me in studying the condition of our county.

Extension work has helped me to be a better citizen through recognition of the fact that through our vote we have the power to help to establish a better government.

It has inspired me to teach my girls the beauties and blessings of farm life.

I have learned to think and to serve beyond my own community.

It has helped us to help ourselves. It has taught us greater respect for our jobs as farm women. It has taught us to make the most of the opportunities at hand.

It has improved living conditions for the farm family and made the work lighter for thousands of farm women throughout the State.

Contentment in the country; an appreciation of the possibilities in farm life.

To date less than one-third of the agricultural counties have county home-demonstration agents, and only one-fifth more of the agricultural counties have had the aid of home-economics specialists from the agricultural college for a few meetings each year.

Mr. President, farm women in America are going through such a period of discouragement due to economic difficulty and inequality of social and educational opportunity for themselves and their children that their courage needs strengthening if the better type of families are to remain on farms. When it is realized how much improvement in condition in farm homes and in morale among farm women has been brought about by the present limited home-demonstration staff, and when it is realized that the farm woman and the farm home are equally vital factors with the farmer and the farm in determining the future of agriculture in America, it would seem wise expenditure of public-funds to extend home-demonstration-agent work to the other two-thirds of the agricultural counties, thus making this helpful service available to all farm women and girls throughout the United States.

One farm woman epitomized the home-demonstration agent as "heaven come to earth in a tin Lizzie." The home-demonstration agent is a friend to every farm woman. The farm home, the farm community, and the business of agriculture are strengthened by her service. Every farm woman in the United States needs the helpful instruction that is made available through the appealing informal human contact with the home-demonstration agent.

This bill provides sufficient funds to cooperate with the States and the counties in the employment of a home-demonstration agent in practically every rural county of the United States.

BOYS' AND GIRLS' 4-H CLUB WORK

Mr. President, the most outstanding feature of the extension work has been the cooperation of men, women, boys, and girls on the common problems of the farm and the home. It would be impossible to develop a productive dairy herd on a farm if the young people were not interested in dairying. It would likewise be impossible to make a happy and comfortable farm home if boys and girls were not interested in farm and home life.

To develop this cooperation, boys' and girls' 4-H club work has been organized throughout the United States. The club work constitutes a part of the national agricultural extension system, by means of which instruction in agriculture and home economics is given to rural boys and girls by the United States Department of Agriculture, the land-grant colleges, the county, and often other local agencies cooperating. The instruction is given by means of farm, home, and community demonstrations and club activities, carried on by the young people themselves for the purpose (1) of helping country boys and girls to improve rural farm and home practices and the social life of their own communities, (2) of showing them the possibilities of rural life, (3) of aiding those who so desire to become efficient farmers and home makers, and (4) of teaching rural boys and girls how to make of themselves public-spirited, useful citizens and leaders in rural affairs.

In the 12-year period following the passage of the Smith-Lever Act, 1915–1926, inclusive, more than 6,000,000 boys and girls have been engaged in 4–H club work. As club members, these boys and girls pledged themselves to carry out a farm or home enterprise, using the best practices developed by the State agricultural colleges and the United States Department of Agriculture. Under the supervision of State and county extension agents of these cooperating institutions, they undertook voluntarily to teach themselves, their friends, and their neighbors, by actual demonstrations, the value of such practices. In so doing, they have made a genuine and substantial contribution to the improvement of American farm life.

Some idea of the proportions to which this work has grown may be gained from the fact that 586,156 different boys and girls were enrolled in the 4–H clubs in 1926, their demonstrations of better practices covering a wide variety of farm and farm-home interests. This growth of the boys' and girls' club movement since the passage of the Smith-Lever Act has been due to the enthusiastic cooperation of the United States Department of Agriculture and the State agricultural colleges, the counties, farm and business organizations, citizens' associations, and the like. This growth is commendable, indeed, and every American may well feel gratified at the progress made thus far. But there is still much to be done.

We have about 11,000,000 boys and girls between the ages of 10 and 18 in the rural districts of the United States, nearly 3,000,000 of whom, or about 27 per cent, are not in school. The greater number not in school are between the ages of 14 and 18. That is a group nearly half as large as the farmers in the United States. These young people are out of school for various reasons—some because their parents want them to work, some because they are tired of school and do not want to attend, some because they do not think an education pays, and some because they do not get along well in school. For one reason or another they are out of school, and out at just the most critical time in their lives. Boys and girls, 14, 15, and 16 years old, just changing to manhood and womanhood, are out of school and receiving little or no guidance from any public agency. How shall we continue their education along right lines? Can we give them any guidance?

The public-school system contemplates giving free instruction to young people for 12 years, or between the ages of 6 to 18. Yet nearly 1,000 rural boys and girls per county—an average of 960—are out of school and away from its influence. Stated in a more graphic way, this is the equivalent of about 20 one-room, 40-pupil schools per county, practically without a single teacher. How can we continue to guide and to educate this group?

FURTHER EDUCATION FOR FARM BOYS AND GIRLS

Mr. President, the State agriculture college is peculiarly interested in rural problems. It is an educational institution. It would seem that these 3,000,000 rural boys and girls out of school in the rural districts of the United States are especially its concern and that of the State. Under the guidance of the agricultural college, and aided by the counties and the people themselves, we should consciously go about reaching, influencing, guiding, and continuing to educate this group.

Boys' and girls' 4–H club work has in it that which appeals to the young people on the farm.

Four–H club work emphasizes cooperation. It provides opportunity for boys and girls to share home responsibilities in keeping with their ability and gives them a part in meeting the problems of their rural community.

Four–H club work is demonstrating good practices in farming and in home making. What is thus being demonstrated is finding its way into the lives of rural people.

Four–H club work develops rural leadership. It is discovering and developing future rural leaders from among the club members themselves as well as providing training for those now acting as club leaders.

Four–H club work emphasizes the home. The practical work of the club—the demonstration—is usually at the home. Club work brings parents and children increasingly together in a common interest.

Club work likewise brings rural young men and women in contact with the best practices and finer things in agriculture and the home, developing in them the right attitude and sympathy toward farm work and the open country and giving them faith in the industry and pride of occupation.

Club work has the further quality of interesting and bringing under its influence the boys and girls out of school as well as the boys and girls in school.

Probably one of the most valuable things club work does, Mr. President, is to bring boys and girls into responsible contact with the live problems of the community. Through having them to do something on the farm or in the home that is worth while, it gets them in touch with men and women who may encourage them to finish school, to go on to college, or otherwise to fit themselves better for life's work.

The extension organization has rendered excellent service by enrolling more than 586,000 boys and girls in these 4–H clubs annually, but as a nation we can not be satisfied until adequate leadership has been provided in every county in the United States, so that every boy or girl between the ages of 12 and 20 years may have the proper direction and help. If 4–H club work is stimulating and helpful to 600,000 boys and girls, it will be equally beneficial to the thousands that are still outside of its influence.

Mr. President, this bill will help to provide the qualified and trained leadership not now available in the extension service, necessary to reach the large number of rural boys and girls who are not now able to participate in the advantages of boys' and girls' 4–H club work.

All of us who have been engaged in public affairs have come in contact with these members of the 4–H clubs. They are serious-minded, happy, industrious young people. These 4–H clubs are open to every boy or girl, without dues or other formalities. The only requirement is that each shall undertake a home project, using the better practices in agriculture or home economics, and then pass the result of the trials on to friends and neighbors. It contributes to national stability and public welfare to have our young people so directed during young manhood and womanhood. This bill will provide for adequate leadership for farm boys and girls in 4–H clubs.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire just a moment to say that I approve very heartily of the sentiments expressed by the junior Senator from Kansas on the farm extension bill. I do not think there is any service that the Government performs in the country which is any better than that service. I think it ought to be extended; I believe the appropriations ought to be increased as provided in this bill; and I shall be very happy to vote for it. I hope that it may come up at a very early day and be passed by the Congress.

REVISED QUOTA SYSTEM OF IMMIGRATION

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, on Saturday last I introduced a bill on the subject of immigration. I made no remarks concerning it, and I do not desire to do so at this late hour; but I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement regarding the effect of that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PROPOSED REVISED QUOTA SYSTEM

The bill proposes that the future immigration quotas of the various European and other countries from which immigration is now limited by the act of 1924 shall be based on both the present system and the so-called national-origin plan which will become effective July 1, 1928, unless modified by congressional action. The proposal is that where the quota as established under the national-origin plan exceeds present allotments, such number shall be the quota of the country concerned, but in no instance shall the quota of any country be less than that now allotted under the 1890 population method.

According to provisional figures submitted to Congress at the last session the quotas of 13 countries would be increased by a total of 47,108 under the proposed plan, the principal increases being as follows: Great Britain and Northern Ireland, from 34,007 to 73,039; Russia, from 2,248 to 4,781; Italy, from 3,845 to 6,091; with minor increases in the quotas of Netherlands, Austria, Spain, Hungary, Greece, Lithuania, Turkey, Yugoslavia, Finland, and Latvia.

On the other hand, if the national-origin plan goes into effect without modification the quotas of 13 countries will be reduced, the principal reductions, according to the provisional figures, being Germany, 51,225 to 23,428; Irish Free State, 28,567 to 13,862; Sweden, 9,561 to 3,259; Norway, 6,453 to 2,267; Denmark, 2,789 to 1,044; Poland, 5,982 to 4,978; Switzerland, 2,081 to 1,198; with smaller decreases for Austria, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Danzig, France, and Rumania. Under this bill, however, there would be neither an increase nor decrease in the quotas of these countries, and the increase of 47,108 in the case of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and other countries would be offset by extending the quota system to countries of the New World, the natives of which may come in unlimited numbers under the present law.

NEW-WORLD QUOTAS

The bill proposes still another method of allotting annual quotas to countries of the Americas, it being provided that such quotas shall be fixed at 10 per cent of the number of natives of such countries resident in the United States as determined by the census of 1890, with a minimum quota of 2,000 for each country.

The proposed annual quotas of New-World sources contrasted with the number of natives of the same areas admitted as nonquota immigrants in the fiscal year 1927 are as follows:

Country	Proposed quotas	Non-quota immigrants admitted in 1927
Canada and Newfoundland	98,094	73,728
Mexico	7,785	77,155
Cuba	2,000	2,279
Dominican Republic, Haiti, and Central America (9 countries)	18,000	1,829
South America (10 countries)	20,000	3,666

TOTAL QUOTAS

If the bill becomes a law every country in the world would have a fixed annual immigration quota, and such quotas would aggregate 357,654, compared to 158,657 quota immigrants, and 158,070 natives of nonquota countries, or a total of 317,727 admitted in the fiscal year 1927 under the act of 1924.

Other provisions of the bill follow:

TEMPORARY LABOR

That in addition to the quotas of foreign contiguous countries the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, may during the next two fiscal years admit temporarily, for periods of not more than six months, not to exceed 10,000 otherwise admissible aliens from each such country to perform seasonal or emergency labor in the United States, provided that labor of like kind unemployed can not be found within a reasonable distance of where such labor is to be performed.

REUNITING FAMILIES

That the lawful wife and minor children of an alien who was legally admitted to the United States for permmnent residence prior to July 1, 1924, shall, on petition of such resident alien in the manner provided in section 9 of the immigration act of 1924, be accorded a nonquota status, but such provision shall not apply in cases where marriage occurred subsequent to such legal entry: Provided, Such wives and minor children depart for the United States within one year from the passage of this act: And provided further, That the number of nonquota visas so issued shall be limited to 30,000.

VISAS FOR FAMILY GROUPS

That an immigration visa shall not be issued to an alien until such visas are also available for issuance to his wife and minor children, but in the event any such alien desires to proceed to the United States in advance of the other members of such family group the visas shall be issued to or made available for such remaining members, such availability to continue for one year from the date of issuance, with a provision that for good cause shown the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, may extend that period one year.

PREFERENCE CLASSES EXTENDED

That 75 per cent of the quotas shall be available for preference in the issuance of immigration visas to relatives of United States citizens and other classes instead of 50 per cent as provided in the present law. That the preference in the issuance of immigration visas now accorded to persons skilled in agriculture, under section 6 of the immigration act of 1924, shall be available only when authorized by the Secretary of Labor and on a valid showing that the service of any such alien is needed in farm work in the United States, or that he is coming to engage in independent agricultural pursuits in this country.

That aliens in whose behalf the contract labor provisions of the general immigration law have been waived, as provided in section 3 of the immigration act of 1917, shall be granted a preference in the issuance of immigration visas, and that like preference shall also be granted to members of the learned professions, such preferences to be authorized by the Secretary of Labor on a valid showing that the service of any such alien is needed in the United States.

PENALTY FOR BRINGING STOWAWAYS

That when an alien stowaway is found on board a vessel arriving at a United States port a fine of $1,000 shall be imposed on the vessel bringing such alien, unless, in the opinion of the Secretary of Labor, the presence of such alien on board could not have been discovered by competent officers of the vessel at the port of departure or during the voyage.

STUDENTS

That immigrant students now classified as nonquota immigrants under the immigration act of 1924 be reclassified as nonimmigrants under section 3 of that act, and that provision be made for their admission under bond as provided in section 15 of the same act.

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY GAME

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 1271 be made the unfinished business. It is the migratory bird bill.

Mr. KING. I shall have to object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I do not care at this time to make a motion to take up the bill; but I give notice now that to-morrow, at the proper time, I desire to make a motion to take it up and make it the unfinished business.

RADIO REGULATION

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I have twice had up to-day Senate bill 2317, Order of Business 228, and there has been some objection; but I think the Senators who objected are willing to agree to the consideration of the bill now, and if it does not take any lengthy debate I should like to have it passed before we adjourn.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire an executive session. If the bill does not lead to debate, I am willing to defer the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of Order of Business 228, Senate bill 2317?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, with an amendment.

Mr. KING. I should like to have the bill read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Interstate Commerce was, on page 2, after line 3, to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 3. Prior to January 1, 1930, the licensing authority shall grant no license or renewal of license under the radio act of 1927 for a broadcasting station for a period to exceed six months and no license or renewal of license for any other class of station for a period to exceed one year.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That all the powers and authority vested in the Federal Radio Commission by the radio act of 1927, approved February 23, 1927, shall continue to be vested in and exercised by the commission until March 16, 1929; and wherever any reference is made in such act to the period of one year after the first meeting of the commission, such reference shall be held to mean the period of two years after the first meeting of the commission.

SEC. 2. The period during which the members of the commission shall receive compensation at the rate of $10,000 per annum is hereby extended until March 16, 1929.

SEC. 3. Prior to January 1, 1930, the licensing authority shall grant no license or renewal of license under the radio act of 1927 for a broadcasting station for a period to exceed six months and no license or renewal of license for any other class of station for a period to exceed one year.

The amendment was agree to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to have an explanation of the significance of that amendment.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that at present a license may be granted for a broadcasting station for three years. This cuts the period down, until 1930, to six months. We so provide because we feel that the continuous development of the art results in so many changes in conditions that the commission should not be permitted to freeze the situation, if I may use the term, by granting licenses for longer than six months.

I may say that the commission has not given a license for more than 60 days up to this time. The licenses for other stations are limited to one year, although the law at present permits the commission to grant five-year licenses. It was felt that during this period of establishment, allocation, and building up of systems these licenses should be limited.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, much could be said in opposition to this bill and in condemnation of the methods employed by the Radio Commission since its creation. I have found very few, if any, satisfied with the commission, with the personnel, or with its administration of the law.

However, there seems to be a situation which calls for some relief, and, as I understand the contention, this will afford some little relief, but it will not bring about all that is desired. I wanted to ask the Senator why he provides for continuing the commission for more than one year from the date of the passage of the bill. The shorter the better, it would seem to me.

Mr. DILL. For the reason that the commission will continue anyhow, and it is just a question of whether the commission is to continue as an appellate body, the Secretary of Commerce to do the original work, or whether it will continue to handle this original jurisdiction work for another year. As I stated a while ago, when I had the matter up before, there has been a lack of money, and two of the commissioners have died and one has left the board, so that the board has been handicapped in doing its work, and the committee felt it ought to have another year to meet those problems, as well as new problems which have arisen under the short-wave length situation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am in sympathy with the purpose of the bill, and I think it ought to pass, but I wanted to ask the Senator whether under this bill any licenses for a longer period than one year will be granted.

Mr. DILL. No licenses have been granted for broadcasting stations for longer than 60 days, and no licenses have been issued for any other class of station for longer than one year. Under the present law they might issue licenses for broadcasting stations for three years, or they might issue licenses for other stations for five years.

Mr. McKELLAR. If this bill passes, under those circumstances will there be a license issued for longer than one year?

Mr. DILL. For the broadcasting stations not more than six months.

Mr. KING. That is the feature of the bill which leads me to support it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Add a new section, to be known as section 4, and to read as follows:

SEC. 4. The term of office of each member of the commission shall expire on February 23, 1929, and thereafter the commissioners shall be appointed for terms of two, three, four, five, and six years, respectively, as provided in the radio act of 1927.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, under the present law, unless we amend it, these commissioners, who have been nominated by the President and whose appointment has been approved by the committee and referred here, will be confirmed for 2, 4, 5, and 6 years. If this amendment shall be adopted, their term of office will expire in one year.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, may I ask whether the present nominations would hold good under this amendment, or would the appointees have to be renominated?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not think they would have to be renominated, for the reason that we have a right to terminate an office when we see fit, and if the office is terminated ipso facto the appointment dies.

Mr. WATSON. I do not think they would have to be renominated under the amendment.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think it would save confusion, however, if before their confirmation by the Senate—and certainly they have not any office until they are confirmed by the Senate—we shall have passed this measure, which declares that the offices of all commissioners shall expire on February 23, 1929.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, how many of the commissioners have already been confirmed whose terms of office extend beyond February 1, 1929?

Mr. PITTMAN. None of them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I am opposed to this radio legislation and I objected to the consideration of this bill; but having been assured by some of my colleagues that it is the best we can get at this time and that possibly we can kill the snake by degrees, I am willing to let the bill go through now.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Washington or the Senator from Nevada, as well as the able chairman of the committee, whether the understanding is that there will be no confirmations until this legislation is disposed of?

Mr. WATSON. I am aware of no understanding about it. I mean by that that if the bill should pass here to-day, my colleague on the committee, Senator DILL, is going to the other House to take it up with the gentlemen there, with some assurance of getting it through. Of course, as far as I am concerned, I think the life of the commission should be extended a year, whether this legislation passes or not. I believe it would be a very great mistake not to do that.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator, I think it was thoroughly developed in the investigation by the committee that the interest of all parties concerned would be greatly enhanced if we restricted the life of the commission as proposed in the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. WATSON. We all agreed to that to-day.

Mr. SMITH. That was thoroughly understood, because it is not only such a technical development, but it is a matter of such vast importance. There is not a single invention of modern times that has in it the element of power, so far as organized society is concerned, that the radio has. Many improvements are being made, and the different methods of the use of radio are changing rapidly, and it is imperative that we shall have more stabilized conditions before we appoint commissioners to hold office for any great length of time.

I sincerely hope that no effort will be made to jeopardize the passage of this measure as it is now amended, either by insisting on compromise or otherwise. I think it would be unjust to the nominees to bring out all the matters gone over in the committee, which are more or less conjectural, and in fairness to them and in fairness to the public at large I believe we ought first to pass this measure as amended.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the chairman of the committee if these nominations have yet been acted upon by the committee, or brought up before the committee?

Mr. WATSON. They were acted on by the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Have they been reported to the Senate?

Mr. WATSON. They have not been reported.

Mr. SMITH. But they have been acted on.

Mr. WATSON. This is the situation, I may say candidly to my friend from Tennessee. The Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] were preparing this amendment, and I had called a meeting of the committee for 2.30 this afternoon for the purpose of finishing up the hearing, or taking action on the confirmations of the radio commissioners. I did not know that those two Senators were down here at work on this amendment. The remainder of the committee, practically all of them, got together and concluded the hearings, and unanimously agreed to report favorably the confirmation of the commissioners. I came down and found that these Senators were disappointed because they had not attended the committee meeting. Whereupon I got in touch with some of the other members of the committee, and we agreed temporarily to hold up the report to the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not understand just what the situation was. I am very glad to have the explanation of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. DILL. I want to say that it was my understanding that we would try to pass this amendment first before the confirmations should be passed upon by the committee.

Mr. WATSON. I agree to that.

Mr. DILL. I think the Senator from Indiana acted in good faith, but it was not in accordance with my understanding, and I appreciate getting the bill through at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill continuing for one year the powers and authority of the Federal Radio Commission under the radio act of 1927, and for other purposes."

PAY OF IMMIGRATION OFFICERS

Mr. CURTIS and Mr. REED of Pennsylvania addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2370, to amend section 24 of the immigration act of 1917.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I may say that I do not think it would take half an hour to finish the consideration of the bill, and it would not interfere with the action proposed by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] a few minutes ago asked unanimous consent to make the so-called migratory bird bill the unfinished business, which was objected to; and he made the statement that in view of the fact that there were so few Senators in the Chamber he would withhold a motion to take the bill up until to-morrow. If the Senator from Pennsylvania insists upon his motion, I shall be constrained to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that the consideration of the migratory bird bill is very likely to take a great deal more time than the consideration of this immigration bill, and I believe we would make time in the Senate by taking up the immigration bill and passing it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. May we consider my motion pending when we meet to-morrow?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator from Pennsylvania does not desire to withdraw his motion, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas has moved to proceed to the consideration of executive business, and the question is on agreeing to that motion.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate (at 5 o'clock p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 7, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, February 6, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our most gracious Father in Heaven, in whom we have our being, do Thou inspire all that is best and noblest in us. With wise determination help us to measure up to the lofty principles and ideals of Thy teaching. Take us this day into Thy divine favor, that this representative body of a great people may have big vision and the finest sense of justice. Every endeavor that is destined to succeed is founded on the broad principles of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. We are here again to work, to touch common toil and to dignify it, to sanctify the homely things of life. Establish Thou the work of our hands. Light up the altar stairs of our souls and give us the blessing of the white hope. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, February 3, 1928, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill H. R. 9481, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes," in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

BILLS AND A JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on February 4, 1928, they presented to the President of the United States for his approval bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 5657. An act granting the consent of Congress to the board of supervisors of Monroe County, Miss., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Tombigbee River at or near Aberdeen, Monroe County, Miss.;

H. R. 9142. An act to amend section 71 of the Judicial Code, as amended, by changing time of holding court at El Dorado and Harrison, Ark.; and

H. J. Res. 93. Joint resolution for the appointment of Paul E. Divine, of Tennessee, as member of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, announced that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 112. An act to amend the act of May 29, 1884, as amended, the act of February 2, 1903, and the act of March 3, 1905, as amended, to include poultry within their provisions.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speakers' table the bill (H. R. 9481) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, and disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 9481, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees: Messrs. WOOD, WASON, and CULLEN.

BRIDGE LEGISLATION

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, to-day is unanimous-consent day and there are a number of bridge bills on the calendar. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] has some remarks which will apply to practically all of these bills, I think, and I believe it would be in the interest of the expedition of the public business if the gentleman be permitted to address the House at this time, and I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may proceed for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object, but I should like to request that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], the member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, who has charge of bridge bills, may have 15 minutes in which to explain the same subject on which the gentleman from Missouri is to speak.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that following the address of the gentleman from Missouri the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] may be permitted to proceed for 15 minutes on the same subject. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I request that I be not interrupted until I have completed my statement, as I shall decline to yield.

Mr. Speaker, at the outset I desire to make it plain to the membership of the House as well as all others interested that I am one who looks upon every man as being honest until proven otherwise. The mere wagging of tongues is not sufficient to make me condemn a man.

On Friday, before the House adjourned, I called the attention of Members present to editorials published in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and St. Louis Star under date of January 28. One editorial conveyed information that holding companies for public utilities were not under the control of either the Missouri Public Utilities Commission or the department administering our blue sky law. I also stated at the time that unless I was convinced by to-day that the people of my city were protected from the sale of securities issued in connection with projects to build toll bridges I would object to a unanimous consent for consideration of bridge bills where the right to construct, and so forth, is vested in an individual or corporation.

Only last summer several constituents of mine came to my office and asked my advice in reference to some bonds they had purchased of a corporation in an Ohio city. This corporation announced its intentions of constructing apartment houses, and the bonds were to pay 7 or 8 per cent interest. The corporation had been put in the hands of a receiver, and the court had issued an order that all bondholders turn over to the receiver within a certain time their bonds and stock to a new holding company, which would issue bonds in lieu thereof. I communicated with the county clerk, secured a copy of the order and other information, and I am convinced, as the assets of the company are vacant lots, $35,000 was lost by my constituents.

The people of St. Louis to-day buy bonds for projects, including bridges, all over the United States. I am interested in the purchasers of such securities, especially in bridge bonds. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] discussed this matter with me Saturday, going over the blue sky law of my State, and he was of the opinion that the people of my State were protected under this law. He also explained to me when a public utility is not a public utility, and that is when it is a toll bridge, unless by an act of the legislature it is specifically declared to be a public utility. He had about convinced me that if our State officials administered the law the people of Missouri could not suffer from inflation. I sent several telegrams to Missouri, and just before coming to the House received a message which convinces me that the issue of bonds and other securities in connection with bridge projects in my State are not all under the supervision of the officials administering the blue sky law. The gentleman who furnishes me with this information is a man of the highest character, and I will read what he says. He is referring to a bridge project in Missouri.

I might say I know personally the gentleman who received the consent of Congress to construct this bridge. They are all men of the highest character and they are not promoters. They are engineers and contractors and have been in business for many, many years.

The bond issue was not subject to approval of any State but was sold through Byllesby Co., of Chicago, who passed on costs and other matters through their engineers. Byllesby listed bonds on Chicago Stock Exchange, which also had its requirements before listing is permitted. I believe most State blue sky laws do not require direct application where stock or bond issue is listed on licensed exchange. Understand Byllesby recently announced they would not handle any more bridge issues, and I am requesting a friend to have them communicate with you. The opinion here is that you have touched on a very big question, and you are right in saying there are possibilities of serious losses. The only protection now seems to be the responsibility of the investment house putting out the issue.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to object to legislation in which so many Members are interested, but I am not convinced that the people of the country have sufficient protection, and therefore I will offer an amendment along the line I suggested in my speech of Friday.

The amendment I suggested is as follows:

At the close of section 7 insert the following: "Provided, That bonds or other securities issued against, or based on, the construction and revenues of said bridge and approaches shall not exceed the actual cost of such construction and operation, economically made, plus a maximum of 10 per cent thereto; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, prior to the issue of any such bonds or other securities, to determine the total thereof which may thus be issued."

Mr. Speaker, I am not in favor of leaving this question entirely to the States. If the Congress has the right, which it unquestionably has, to grant consent for the construction of a bridge, it likewise has the right not only to limit the cost of such structure but also to limit the amount of securities that might be issued. The bridge can not be constructed until the Secretary of War approves the plans and specifications.

The bills now provide that sworn statements in reference to cost of construction, and so forth, shall be filed with the Secretary of War within 90 days after completion, and that the Secretary of War, if requested within a given period, shall determine the actual cost thereof and that the findings of the Secretary shall be conclusive for the purposes mentioned in section 4, which refers to the purchase of the bridge. The section protects the city, county, or State which might desire to acquire the property, but where does the purchaser of the securities come in? If bonds or other securities in excess of that amount have been issued, the public—your constituents and mine, the purchasers of these securities—is the loser, as is generally the case.

My amendment will not only further protect the cities, counties, and States but it will also protect the general public from inflation. If the bridge does not result in a paying proposition, that is entirely another matter. It is up to the public before purchasing securities to investigate, and if the people put their money in a nonpaying proposition, we can not be blamed.

We have a responsibility as well as the State officials, because it is the Congress that makes the project possible.

Bonds and other securities for the building of bridges can unquestionably be placed under control of the Government, and such action would be a check on the officials of the various States who administer the blue sky laws.

I simply ask that the Congress grant all the protection it possibly can to the purchaser of the securities issued in connection with a project it sanctions.

Surely, no honest promoter should object to a 10 per cent profit over the actual investment. If he does, he is not entitled to the consent of Congress to construct a bridge.

Your constituents and mine have the right to hold us responsible in the event such securities as I have mentioned are found to be inflated.

In conclusion I simply want to suggest that when the bridge bills are considered to-day they be separated. I will not offer my amendment where the right is vested in a city, county, or any agency of a State.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. I understood the gentleman to give one illustration of a corporation that built apartment houses. Where bridges have been built can the gentleman give instances in which people have been imposed upon, as suggested in the gentleman's remarks?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I am not in the habit of repeating any hearsay information I receive. I have no direct knowledge that I would be warranted in calling to the gentleman's attention. Before I would call a matter of that kind to the gentleman's attention I would want positive knowledge.

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not ask the gentleman to give the names of the particular bridges, but I thought the gentleman would have some information where this legislation had been greatly abused in a great number of cases and, therefore, the necessity of some sort of an amendment as suggested by the gentleman.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I admit I have information, but I will not repeat it on the floor, because I do not want to cast any reflection on any gentlemen, where I am not absolutely positive abuses have occurred.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is the gentleman willing to state that this kind of legislation has resulted in a great many abuses or is it confined to one or two particular cases?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The possibility of abuses is apparent.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am not talking about the possibilities.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. And that is what I am trying to guard against. I want to close the doors of the stable before the horse is gone.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Does the amendment which the gentleman has suggested include bridges that are wholly within a State?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It includes any bridge, whether it be within a State or whether it connects two States, if the consent of Congress is given to an individual or a corporation other than a railroad, because I understand a railroad bridge is under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I am satisfied with that.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I think I can make a short statement that will clear up the question raised by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN]. The gentleman from Missouri is entirely mistaken in his attitude, and while I recognize, of course, the perfect right of every Member of the House to raise an objection to any bill on the Consent Calendar, and never criticize anybody for doing so if he has a good reason for it, yet I hope my friend from Missouri will not persist in his attitude. These bridge bills are of great importance to the communities in which they are to be built, and to the Members of Congress who introduce them, and unless a Member has a valid and a forceful reason I do not think he ought to insist upon an objection to their consideration.

Let me state briefly what we do in connection with these bills. I am speaking now of bills authorizing private companies or individuals to build bridges over navigable waters. In the first place, we see to it in the forms we have prepared that the interests of the Government are protected, so far as navigation is concerned. Then we have also provided for the protection of the public that use the bridge by providing the right of recapture in case the public wants to take the bridge over for the purpose of operating it as a free bridge.

We provide that the builder has to make a sworn itemized statement of the costs, after he has completed the bridge, and file it with the Secretary of War and with the highway department of the State in which the bridge is located. Then we authorize the Secretary of War to make an investigation of that statement and of the costs of the bridge, if he wishes to do so; and we provide that he shall do so if the highway department of the State in which it is located asks him to do so. He is authorized to make this investigation of the cost and to find the actual cost of the bridge.

Not only this, but we authorize the Secretary of War to find what is the reasonable cost or the value of the bridge, and without regard to what the parties spend; it is the reasonable value of the bridge that determines its value for recapture purposes. So that there is no possibility of any person who may be disposed to be dishonest and improperly pad their statement of costs to do so, because it is all subject to investigation; and however they might pad the statement we authorize the fixing of a reasonable value and we authorize the State to take over the bridge upon that basis at any time in accordance with the terms specified in the law.

My friend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], because some of his friends have lost money in buying bonds on some apartment house in some part of the country, now proposes to offer an amendment to these bridge bills. For what purpose? To protect the persons who may buy stocks or bonds in a bridge from dishonest transactions. In other words, he wants us to modify these bridge bills so as to make each one of them a blue sky bill at the same time.

Gentlemen, we can not do this. In the first place, the regulation of these matters within the States is a matter for the States themselves and every State of the Union, except two, has enacted what is called a blue sky law or a fraudulent securities law. The State of Missouri has one of the very best laws of this kind. The State of Illinois has a good one, as well as Kentucky, Arkansas, Pennsylvania, and other States. They have enacted blue sky laws, or fraudulent securities laws to protect their people against the sale of fraudulent stocks and securities.

The State of Missouri has a blue sky law which provides in section 3, which I want to quote, as follows:

> No person, either acting personally or through an agent, or as the agent of another, shall, on or after the date when this act goes into effect, sell any security to any person in the State of Missouri contrary to the provisions of this act.

Now, section 7 of the act provides:

> No security not exempted under any of the provisions of section 4, unless sold in any transaction exempt under the provisions of section 5, shall be sold to any person within the State of Missouri unless and until the issue of securities, of which such security to be so sold is a part, shall have been recorded in the register of qualified securities, as hereinafter provided.

So that any person offering any kind of security, that is not exempt under the law, for sale in the State of Missouri must go to the State officials and have it registered, submit to an examination, have an inquiry made as to its good faith and as to the amount of money that has been put into it, and have it thoroughly and carefully qualified before it can be sold, and if they sell it without doing this they are liable to be sent to the penitentiary.

Bridge bonds or bridge stock is not exempted under the laws of the State of Missouri. The bonds or securities of public utilities are exempted under the law of the State of Missouri just as they are in most other States that have blue sky laws. Why? Because if it is a public utility it is regulated by the public utility commission of the State; that commission regulates the issuance of such securities and therefore, in order to avoid duplication of services, the blue sky law exempts the securities of public utilities. But if it is not a public utility, and therefore not regulated by the public utility commission of the State, it is subject to the blue sky law of the State and the people are protected. So that the constituents of my friend from Missouri are fully protected against any fraudulent sale of stock or bonds in Missouri on bridges built in that State.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I assume from the gentleman's argument that a bridge is not classed as a public utility?

Mr. DENISON. It is not. It is in some States; for instance, in Pennsylvania, but in that State where it is so classified it is regulated as a public utility, just like a telephone company, gas company, or an intrastate railroad, and its securities are subject to regulation by that commission.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. In reference to the statement made just a moment ago with regard to public utilities, that is exactly what caused me to investigate this matter. The editorial to which I have referred stated that the officials of the Public Utilities Commission of Missouri and the officials who administer the blue sky law had said that they have no control over a holding company for a public utility.

Now, would the holding company be the company that would handle the bonds? Further, I will say to the gentleman the information I read to the House concerning the issue of bonds in connection with a project comes directly from one of the men to whom you granted the consent of Congress to build the bridge. That proves to me beyond a doubt that the State of Missouri, if it has the power, is not doing what it should do in reference to the bonds.

Mr. DENISON. I think I know what the gentleman means. I do not know anything about the particular case, but I understand what he is trying to get at. While I stated that practically every State has a good blue sky law sufficient to protect its own people from the sale of fraudulent securities, the Federal Government has never yet enacted a national blue sky law. Therefore there is no law to prevent the sending through the mails from one State to another of fraudulent securities for sale. That is one instance where we can not have exact justice, because there is no Federal securities law. I have had a bill pending in Congress for five years to provide such a law. It passed the House once, but did not get through the Senate.

I have studied that matter as much, I think, as any man in the House, and I have never heard that any money has been lost through the sale of fraudulent stocks or bonds for building bridges. There have been losses through the sale of fraudulent oil stocks, through the sale of fraudulent mining stock, through the sale of fraudulent stocks of other kinds, but I have never heard of any loss through the sale of bridge bonds. Why my friend picks out this more or less innocent form of investment and omits from his consideration other stocks and bonds I do not know.

At any rate, we can not make blue sky bills out of bridge bills. We have gone as far as we can go in a practical manner. Not only that, but neither the Chief of Engineers or the Secretary of War have any facilities for the examination of stocks and bonds issued for building bridges all over the United States. If we should confer that authority on the Secretary of War, we would have to increase his clerical and official force several hundred, and we would have to grant jurisdiction to the War Department over such securities, which his department has no business with. Until we can get to the point where Congress is willing to pass a national blue sky law we will have to depend on the States to protect the people from fraudulent bridge bonds, if any such should ever be offered for sale.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I will.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I concede everything the gentleman has said in reference to the manner in which the committee protects the cities, counties, and States, but I think the gentleman is inconsistent. He says that if we confer this authority on the Secretary of War, he has no method of examining stocks and bonds. I am not asking that. You tell the Secretary of War that he must, after the completion of the bridge, if the request is made, put a reasonable value on the project. If you are going to compel the Secretary of War to do that after the bridge is completed, would it not be just as easy to compel the Secretary of War to do it before the drafting of the plans and specifications?

Mr. DENISON. He has no facilities for exercising that power; he has no such jurisdiction. He says that it is a matter about which they have no information; that they have no facilities for examining stocks and bonds with a view to protecting the public. That is a matter that the States must attend to.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I will.

Mr. LOZIER. Is it not true that under the stereotyped form of bridge bills the interest of the investing public is protected when the Secretary of War makes an affirmative finding as to the cost of the structure? When the bond issue is floated has not the investor an opportunity of ascertaining from the War Department the cost of the bridge—not only the actual cost as reported by the projectors of the bridge, but the making of the affirmative finding of the costs? Has not the investor access to that information?

Mr. DENISON. We have gone as far as we can practically go in protecting the public, and the bridge bill forms as now used will protect the public.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I will ask the gentleman what good would it be to the investor to find out after the bridge is completed the bond issue has been inflated? Here is a bridge that cost a million dollars, and securities are issued for a million and a half. After the bridge is built they call on the Secretary of War to determine the value, and the Secretary determines that $1,000,000 is a fair value for the bridge. Securities are issued for a million and a half—who is going to pay the inflated half million dollars?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for three minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I want to point out, if I can, the unfortunate situation in which my friend from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] is involved. He has picked out one form of investment, and he asks Congress in these bridge bills to protect the public, and let all other forms of investment go. I have not heard him undertaking to protect the public against other forms of investment, and there are thousands of different forms of investment. He comes here and wants to stop the progress of bridge building, as far as he can do it, because he fancies that possibly somewhere somebody may lose some money in investing in bridge securities. It seems to me that his position is entirely untenable, and I hope the gentleman will not place himself in that attitude.

If my friend from Missouri will join with me and help me get a Federal blue sky bill through Congress that will prevent the sale, through the avenues of interstate commerce, of any fraudulent securities, he will render the public a valuable service, not only in his State and in his city, but in the entire Nation.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If the gentleman will read my speech of last Friday, he will see that I did say that I would join him in such an effort.

Mr. DENISON. Until we do that, I think the gentleman is making a mistake in standing in the way of progress and preventing or delaying the construction of bridges.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I suggest to the gentleman that the recapture clause in these bills will not only minimize but probably eliminate the issue of a large amount of watered stock, because under the recapture clause when a State or a county or a municipality takes over the bridge, an investor is not going to put his money into a bridge in which the aggregate amount of security is largely in excess of the actual cost of construction.

Mr. DENISON. Certainly not, if he is intelligent; and we must assume that the average man has average intelligence, and he is not going to put his money into that kind of investment if the bridge is built under the terms we now require.

Mr. COMBS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. COMBS. I believe that the assumption of my colleague from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] is that the blue-sky commissions have no jurisdiction over a holding company.

Mr. DENISON. In that, of course, he is wrong.

Mr. COMBS. It may be that they have no jurisdiction over the activities of holding companies in other States; but if those securities are offered for sale in other States, they must comply with the requirements of the finance commission in order to qualify for sale in those States, and likewise, a holding company organized in another State, offering these securities in the State of Missouri, must get the securities qualified under our laws before they are exempt from the operation of this particular act.

Mr. DENISON. That is true.

Mr. COMBS. In other words, we are protected.

Mr. DENISON. You are fully protected. The statement that stocks or securities of holding companies are exempted is entirely misleading. They are not exempted unless the securities they hold, and against which they are issuing their bonds, are either exempted under the law or are qualified under the law.

Let me make this final statement. I have made a study of the blue sky laws of every State, and every State has such a law except the States of Delaware and Nevada, I believe. These laws go a long way toward protecting the citizens against the sale of fraudulent securities. I am one of those who believe that we ought to leave such matters to the States to protect their own citizens. If they do not protect their own citizens, that is their fault and it is not the fault of the Federal Government. I do think that we ought to go as far as we can and help the States enforce their laws; but when we undertake to pass an interstate fraudulent security law we ought to apply it to all kinds of securities. We can not do any good by attaching an amendment to a bridge bill.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Does not the gentleman think, if we are going to adopt a policy of that sort, that we ought to include all sorts of securities, including securities based on foreign loans as well as securities based on the present tremendously desirable work of constructing bridges in this country?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; the gentleman from Virginia is right about that.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask the particular attention of my friend from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] to a suggestion that I wish to offer. Some of these bridge bills are in the nature of emergency measures and should be passed at once if at all. The gentleman from Missouri has his idea upon this subject, and he is to be commended for his desire to protect the public interest. I do not agree with him that the serious situation is presented as regards bridge bonds that he thinks is presented; but, however that may be, I am wondering if the gentleman will not, when we reach these bills, be willing to let them be considered and offer his amendment and let the House pass upon that amendment. It seems to me that the gentleman might very well consider doing that.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would be perfectly willing to offer my amendment, and I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] that he call up one of the bills, and if that is voted down in the House, I shall then offer a motion to recommit and endeavor to get a vote of the House upon the question. With that I shall be satisfied. I am still convinced that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] has not covered my point, and that is that you provide protection for the city, county, and State after the bridge is built when it comes to the question of purchase, but you provide no protection for the man who makes it possible to build that bridge by buying the bonds of the promoters. I am perfectly willing to offer the amendment, but I will insist on a record vote and I will be entitled to that unless a quorum is present.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit, I suggest that he can do it on the first bill. If the gentleman will permit it to be considered in the regular way, of course he will have an opportunity to offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the Consent Calendar.

TRANSFER OF THE OKANOGAN PROJECT, WASHINGTON

The first business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 1661) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to transfer the Okanogan project, in the State of Washington, to the Okanogan irrigation district upon payment of charges stated.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. This bill requires three objections.

Mr. CRAMTON. I object.

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I object.

The SPEAKER. Three objections. The Clerk will call the next bill.

ABANDONED MILITARY RESERVATIONS IN ALASKA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9031) to provide further for the disposal of abandoned military reservations in the Territory of Alaska, including Signal Corps stations and rights of way.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I object.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object in this particular case—but I want to refer to the situation in regard to these cases which are passed over without prejudice. The first bill presented a question relating to that matter. It seems to me that passing over a bill without prejudice can only be done and should only be done in a case like the one pending, where the request is made before objection has been made to the consideration of the bill. After objection is made to the consideration of the bill it seems to me the rule operates to take the bill off the calendar.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is customary, when objection is made and a gentleman is asked to withdraw his objection, and he withdraws his objection, to pass over the bill without prejudice, but if that should occur after objection is made that will take place.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the objecting Member states that he does not object to the request, that it be passed over without prejudice it might be all right; but that can not be the case when the order is changed when the objecting Member is absent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The objection is withdrawn. The Clerk will call the next bill.

JURISDICTION OVER OIL AND GAS LEASES

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 1959) to transfer to the Secretary of the Navy jurisdiction over oil and gas leases issued by the Secretary of the Interior on lands in naval petroleum reserves.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Last week I objected to this bill on the ground that several Members were in doubt as to the purport of this bill. I think the purpose is this: To transfer the supervision of the oil and gas lands from the Interior Department to the Navy Department, and that leaves the matter in status quo.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from New York knows that with respect to a not very far away Secretary of the Navy the Senate of the United States found that he had been guilty of reprehensible conduct concerning naval oil leases and asked that the President dismiss him. The President did not dismiss him, but he resigned. I doubt the advisability of placing this responsibility there in the Navy Department.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have conferred with Senator WALSH in the other body, and he advised putting the responsibility there.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, the Senate, including Senator WALSH, condemned this former Secretary of the Navy for handling just such oil-lease business. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard. The Clerk will call the next bill.

HOSPITAL AT DAYTON SOLDIERS' HOME

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 132) authorizing the erection of a sanitary fireproof hospital at the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Dayton, Ohio.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is a bill that proposes an expenditure of a million and a half dollars, and there is no report presented to us from any agency of the Government having responsibility in connection with this proposed expenditure. There is nothing here showing that it has ever been brought to the attention of the Budget, or whether or not it is in harmony with the President's financial program. Of course, a hospital is for a purpose that causes us all to sympathize with the expenditure. If the hospital is needed to the extent that the committee report suggests, there should be no difficulty in finding some branch of the Government that would certify to that effect, and I have no reason to believe that there would be difficulty in getting the President, through the Budget Office, to approve of such expenditures. But until that is done it would seem the bill might rest.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is not this recommended by the Board of Managers? I understand that hearings were held at that time.

Mr. CRAMTON. At any rate, we ought to have a statement from the board that is responsible for that work.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I understand the gentleman's position is that if such a hospital is needed he is perfectly willing to allow the million and a half dollars to be expended, but until it is properly demonstrated that such a hospital is needed, and the spending of the $1,500,000 is properly safeguarded, he does not want this bill to come up and be passed in a quarter of a minute. That is the gentleman's position, is it not?

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman has stated it correctly.

Mr. BLANTON. That was my position exactly the other day, and yet many papers in the State of Texas reported that I was against a veterans' hospital, when such was not the case.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I have continually protested during the seven years that I have been a Member of Congress against the little attention that the Congress has paid to the needs of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

These homes were put under the control of a board of managers, to be selected by the Congress, at a time when Congress was on the outs with the President of the United States and would not trust him. This is one of the few agencies of our administrative system that is not under the control of the President or some branch of our regular administrative system. Responsibilities were assumed by Congress, but Congress will pay little attention to matters connected with the soldiers' homes. I could not even get Congress to elect the successors of men on that board whose terms had expired for years. I could not get this House to authorize the publication of the reports of the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Homes, and that has not been done until within the last year or two.

I want to say to this House that the Member from North Carolina and myself inspected this hospital several years ago. We found it to be a fire trap built in 1868, that several hundred helpless men were confined to beds in the hospital, and that 700 major operations were performed in that hospital in a year. Then we brought the inspectors of the fire department and the State inspectors there to find out what the real condition of that hospital was, and they found it a fire trap. That was the reason for the introduction of this bill at the request of the Board of Managers and undoubtedly with knowledge of the President and Director of the Budget.

Mr. CRAMTON. My colleague from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] has shown me letters which indicate the approval of this bill by the Board of Managers. The House was entitled to that information in the report so that we would all have that information. I am willing to accept the showing my colleague has made so far as that part is concerned, but I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio as to whether he has ever brought this matter to the attention of the Budget Office to learn whether this is in harmony with the President's financial program.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. It does not make any difference to me whether or not the President or Budget Bureau wants to murder these men in these hospitals or not. I take it for granted it is, for it must be in harmony with any sound financial program. This House has passed this bill twice before.

Mr. CRAMTON. Nothing I have said justifies any outburst. No one assumes the President does want to murder anybody, because I am assuming that if this is needed the gentleman will have no trouble in getting his approval of it, but until that is done, I object.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. JAMES. My colleague asks why this letter was not included in the report. The reason for that was that the letter was not written at the time the report was made. During the Christmas vacation I went out and saw this hospital myself. I saw the conditions, and then I had the president of the board write me a letter, and I talked with the president of the board about it to-day.

Mr. CRAMTON. I accept that part of it entirely, and I assume the President and the Budget Office would be entirely agreeable to this if they ever had a chance to consider it. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice in order that it may be submitted to the Budget Office and come up at the next meeting.

Mr. BLANTON. Before the gentleman makes that request, I want to ask the gentleman from Michigan a question, if he will permit. Did not the Military Affairs Committee have its day on Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. JAMES. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, it has two days, has it not?

Mr. JAMES. In the future; yes.

Mr. BLANTON. It will have its two days now before very long. Why could it not take up this bill in an orderly manner—this million and a half dollar bill—on one of its two Calendar Wednesday days and pass it in about an hour?

Mr. JAMES. This bill passed the House at the last Congress by unanimous consent, but died in the Senate because of the filibuster.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I would like to reserve the right to object in order to make an observation with reference to this national military home. My colleague from Dayton has stated the conditions exactly. Because the institution is under congressional management instead of the executive, naturally they are not in a position to make recommendations. All of us who have visited that home and then visited the rest of the homes or hospitals can not come away without believing that certainly some improvement is needed at this particular home.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. In just one minute; and then I will be glad to yield. I regret very much that this can not be passed. There may never be a fire at this home, but if a fire should occur there every one of us would regret it to our last day. I would like to see it get through the House. It may be a little difficult to get it through the Senate; I do not know; but if we can get it through the House there is the chance that it would get through the Senate. What is being asked here is only in line with everything we have done for the soldiers.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman knows if we are going to have a Budget system that amounts to anything items of one million and a half dollars can not be rushed through here without the Budget having a chance to express itself with reference to them.

Mr. BEGG. I grant that, and I very seldom try to break down the Budget recommendations, although I have once or twice successfully; but no single individual office like the Budget Office can have first-hand information about every little detail there is in the country like a hospital, particularly when we have arrogated to ourselves the right to run such hospitals.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio I am not one to always follow absolutely the recommendations of the Budget, but I think it is necessary to give the Budget a chance to present to Congress its views, and in this case there has been no attempt, apparently, to get an expression from the Budget, an expression that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD] could have gotten in two days' time if he asked for it, I assume.

Mr. BEGG. I can not speak for my colleague as to why he did or why he did not do anything of that kind. The only thing I can speak about from first-hand information is that having visited this hospital I know it is a fire trap and there will be a calamity if a fire occurs there. That is all I know. I know that to be true.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. BEGG. Gladly.

Mr. BLANTON. There is no disposition that I have observed upon the part of any Member here on the floor to prevent a proper hospital from being built, but this bill comes from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BEGG. And they have O. K'd it.

Mr. BLANTON. That committee will have two days on the calendar and their time is coming pretty soon. That committee could pass this bill in an hour on one of those days.

Mr. BEGG. My answer to the gentleman is that the Military Affairs Committee has plenty to do on those two days and there is not anything inconsistent with the action of this House in the past in doing this by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLANTON. They have nothing more important or more urgent than the building of proper hospital facilities.

Mr. BEGG. They have plenty of other things just as important to consume the time they have here.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. BEGG. Gladly.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that some years ago the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD] and I visited this hospital. It is a burning shame and an everlasting disgrace that you would put veterans of the Civil War and veterans of the Spanish War in a building that you know is a fire trap. The building where they handle their surgical cases is a four-story building, and it should either be demolished and the hospital moved somewhere else or if you are going to keep it you should put a building there where these men will be safe. [Applause.]

Mr. BEGG. I thank the gentleman. That is what every man will say who goes there and sees this building.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio that this very proposition is up now in the pending hospital bill before the Veterans' Committee. There has been a movement on foot to have the Veterans' Bureau take over these soldiers' homes. Up to the present time that provision has been kept out of the bill by the members on the committee from the Southern States, but the Director of the Veterans' Bureau submitted statistics a few days ago that showed that by 1939 the Civil War inmates of these homes will all have passed away and that sooner or later it will be necessary for the Veterans' Bureau to take the homes over. I have not discussed this matter privately with the chairman of the subcommittee before whom these hearings are being held, but my opinion is that a majority of the members of the Veterans' Committee, and especially of the majority party on the Veterans' Committee, are going to favor turning these homes over to the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman permit an interruption right there?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Granted that is so, the passage of this bill would not interfere with their ultimately being taken over.

Mr. RANKIN. I understand that, and I am just wondering whether or not the passage of this bill at this time would interfere with the bureau's program of construction?

Mr. BEGG. Not in the least.

Mr. RANKIN. The program is now being worked out by the Veterans' Bureau, and I want to know whether or not the gentleman in charge of this bill has discussed this matter with the Director of the Veterans' Bureau or with those in charge of that legislation?

Mr. BEGG. Let me comment on the gentleman's statement. Suppose the Veterans' Bureau building program did not include a new hospital at the Dayton Soldiers' Home. Let us assume that for the sake of the argument. You would not for a single moment sanction keeping until 1939 several hundred veterans of the Civil War and the Spanish-American War in a building that everybody who visits it will concede is a fire trap?

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption right on that point?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Why this sudden uneasiness about this matter?

Mr. BEGG. It is not at all sudden.

Mr. BLANTON. For years I have been going by this Soldiers' Home in Dayton, and they seemed to be getting along fine.

Mr. BEGG. We have been after this for at least a couple of years.

Mr. BLANTON. They have not had a fire there yet.

Mr. BEGG. That is true, and we may not have a fire there for 20 years.

Mr. BLANTON. Everything has been going along there smoothly for 15 or 20 years. Why this sudden uneasiness about it?

Mr. BEGG. We may not have one for years, or we may have one there to-morrow night.

Mr. BLANTON. And likewise this Capitol may then have one.

Mr. RANKIN. Let me say to the gentleman from Ohio that if this program goes through for the Veterans' Bureau to take over these soldiers' homes, and they find it is not necessary to rebuild the home at this place, other provisions will be made.

Mr. BEGG. You can not do that. The old Civil War soldiers or the Spanish-American soldiers can not be moved away from Dayton by the Veterans' Bureau or by anybody else. You can not do that.

Mr. BULWINKLE. The gentleman knows that any construction at Dayton is not connected with the Veterans' Bureau, but if he were to take it over he would come here with the same proposition, because he could not discard the whole outfit and have a safe surgical hospital.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over for a half hour and called up again as soon as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] may confer with the Budget commissioner.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over for half an hour. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PERSONAL PHYSICIAN TO THE PRESIDENT

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5658) allowing the rank, pay, and allowances of a colonel, Medical Corps, United States Army, to the medical officer assigned to duty as personal physician to the President.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill takes three objections. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON, Mr. LAGUARDIA, and Mr. SOMERS of New York objected.

PERMANENT INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF ROAD CONGRESSES

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 107) to provide that the United States extend to the Permanent International Association of Road Congresses an invitation to hold the sixth session of the association in the United States, and for the expenses thereof.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Reserving the right to object, section 2 of the bill is not drawn in harmony with the bill submitted by the department, and is broader than the section submitted by the department, in that it contains this language, "subsistence or per diem in lieu of subsistence—notwithstanding the provisions of any other act." Of course, the purpose of that is to take these items out of the general limitations of law. If the gentleman will agree to an amendment striking out section 2 and substituting section 2, as submitted by the department, I have no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I shall have no objection to that.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, for the present I object. I think $25,000 is entirely too large a sum.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I have no desire, gentlemen, to take up too much time, but this is a very important bill. It is a bill to have the congress of the Permanent International Association of Road Congresses to come to the United States. Of course, the President has the power to invite the International Congress to the United States, but he has not the power to pay for the expenses of these delegates, printing, and so forth, without authorization from Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. I doubt whether it will ever be worth a penny to the people of the United States.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not think the gentleman is right about that. The congress is composed of men from all over the world. The gentleman from Texas knows that the great bulk of automobiles is owned in the United States. Out of the 32,000,000 automobiles 27,000,000 are owned in the United States. If you want to create a larger market for automobiles and for road material, you will have to create it in other countries also.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the keynote of the whole proposition—it is to help get more markets for the manufacturers in this country. It is to make the Government pay for their advertising.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think all international congresses are a good thing.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It is the intention to bring this congress to the United States, and when it is here, after the deliberations of the convention, it is the purpose of the committee to take those interested in automobiles, road building, and other industries on a visit through the United States. It is proposed to take 300 through the country to see what we are doing.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, they all know what we are doing, and we know what they are doing.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will.

Mr. LOZIER. Is it not a fact that road building in Europe is in an experimental stage, and might they not make a material contribution to the science of road building, which is a question of vital importance to the American people?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Absolutely, and I would like to give the gentleman some figures on this. The present membership comprises 45 countries, including the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. There were 40 countries represented here three years ago—was the gentleman from Maryland here?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I was. I was not only here, but I was at the one in Paris this summer at my own expense. To go on with these figures, 45 countries, 458 collective bodies, 1,370 private members, of whom 550 are life members. This is a large organization, and is the only organization in existence of this kind. I do not think the gentleman should object. This is recommended by the President and the Secretary of State and by the Budget.

Mr. BLANTON. We are having entirely too many of them, and they are costing the people too much.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

PAN AMERICAN CONFERENCE ON HIGHWAYS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 108) to provide for the expenses of participation by the United States in the Second Pan American Conference on Highways at Rio de Janeiro.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

MIDDLE RIO GRANDE CONSERVANCY DISTRICT

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 70) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to execute an agreement with the Middle Rio Grande conservancy district providing for conservation, irrigation, drainage, and flood control for the Pueblo Indian lands in the Rio Grande Valley, N. Mex., and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I find there is a direct appropriation here of $100,000. The balance is authorization. Will the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. MORROW] state the necessity for that, if that is correct?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, the language to which the gentleman refers does not actually make the appropriation, although it sounds very much like it. The language in lines 11, 12, 13, and part of 14, on page 2, are not at all essential. I have gone over the matter with the gentleman from New Mexico as to some amendments to the bill, and he has agreed to accept the amendment striking out the lines to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is satisfactory to me, and I withdraw the objection.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, if there is no objection, then I ask unanimous consent to substitute for this bill the Senate bill 700.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, there are certain amendments I would like to see made to the bill. Most of them relate rather to the form and the verbiage than to the substance. There is at least one of importance, and that is as to the reimbursable feature, to insure the return of the entire amount expended. I have gone over the matter with the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. MORROW], and I understand that the amendments that I have in mind are agreeable to him.

Mr. MORROW. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I wonder if it would not be well to have my amendment read for the information of the House. Sometimes after the stage of objection is passed, some Members, not party to the agreement, manifest a sudden interest in the bill. I feel very keenly about the question of the one amendment to which I have referred, and I would not want to let the objection stage pass without being assured that the bill if it passes at all would contain this amendment; and in that, as I understand it, I have the entire sympathy of the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the amendments being read. I only desire to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill, to be amended as the gentleman from Michigan suggests.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the amendments he proposes to offer to the bill in case consent is given may be read for the information of the House. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request at this time and will let the matter proceed in the ordinary way.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Mexico asks unanimous consent to substitute Senate bill 700 for the bill now under consideration. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the Senate bill, to strike out all after the enacting clause, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON to the Senate bill: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to enter into an agreement with the middle Rio Grande conservancy district, a political subdivision of the State of New Mexico, providing for conservation, irrigation, drainage, and flood control for the Pueblo Indian lands situated within the exterior boundaries of the said middle Rio Grande conservancy district, as provided for by plans prepared for this purpose in pursuance to an act of February 14, 1927 (44 Stat. L. p. 1098). The construction cost of such conservation, irrigation, drainage, and flood-control work apportioned to the Indian lands shall not exceed $1,593,311, and said sum, or so much thereof as may be required to pay the Indians' share of the cost of the work herein provided for, shall be payable in not less than five installments without interest, which installments shall be paid annually as work progresses: Provided, That should at any time it appear to the said Secretary that construction work is not being carried out in accordance with plans approved by him, he shall withhold payment of any sums that may under the agreement be due the conservancy district until such work shall have been done in accordance with the said plans: Provided further, That in determining the share of the cost of the works to be apportioned to the Indian lands there shall be taken into consideration only the Indian acreage benefited which shall be definitely determined by said Secretary and such acreage shall include only lands feasibly susceptible of economic irrigation and cultivation and materially benefited by this work; and in no event shall the average per acre cost for the area of Indian lands benefited exceed $67.50: Provided further, That all present water rights now appurtenant to the approximately 8,346 acres of irrigated pueblo lands owned individually or as pueblos under the proposed plans of the district, and all water for the domestic purposes of the Indians and for their stock shall be prior and paramount to any rights of the district or of any property holder therein, which priority so defined shall be recognized and protected in the agreement between the Secretary of the Interior and the said middle Rio Grande conservancy district, and the water rights for the newly reclaimed lands shall be recognized as equal to those of like district lands and be protected from discrimination in the division and use of water, and such water rights, old as well as new, shall not be subject to loss by nonuse or abandonment thereof so long as title to said lands shall remain in the Indians individually or as pueblos or in the United States, and such irrigated area of approximately 8,346 acres shall not be subject by the district or otherwise to any prorata share of the cost of future operation and maintenance or betterment work performed by the district. The share of the cost paid the district on behalf of the Indian lands under the agreement herein authorized, including any sum paid to the district from the funds authorized to be appropriated by the act of February 14, 1927 (44 Stat. L. p. 1098) shall be reimbursed to the United States under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That such reimbursement shall be made only from leases or proceeds from the newly reclaimed pueblo lands, and there is hereby created against such newly reclaimed lands a first lien, which lien shall not be enforced during the period that the title to such lands remains in the pueblos or individual Indian ownership: Provided further, That said Secretary of the Interior, through the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or his duly authorized agent, shall be recognized by said district in all matters pertaining to its operation in the same ratio that the Indian lands bear to the total area of lands within the district, and that the district books and records shall be available at all times for inspection by said representative."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The similar House bill 70 was laid on the table.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. We would like to know what it is about.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is about District schools.

Mr. BLANTON. In that connection I want to reserve the right to object. I want to ask the gentleman a question in regard to the District business. We are asked to set aside our public business now to take up District business. I notice that on an appropriation bill the Senate has placed a legislative amendment that would authorize the United States Bureau of Efficiency to spend part of its time in checking up District business. Is that done with the consent of the gentleman's committee in the House?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not touching on the Bureau of Efficiency to-day.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I shall not interfere with the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, for the last three years I have been a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations handling the bill for the District of Columbia. When the bill is coming up for consideration in the committee, and prior to its coming before the House, the newspapers of Washington always carry articles about the condition of the public schools in Washington. On Saturday morning in the Washington Post there was an editorial entitled "Shameful school conditions," that makes such preposterous and absurd statements about the District schools that the subcommittee on the District bill have thought that we should discuss it briefly now rather than wait until that bill comes before the House within the next three weeks.

The parents in the District of Columbia know that the statements made in this editorial are not true. The editorial can have but one purpose, and that to induce Members of Congress who do not, and can not of necessity, study District affairs to reach a conclusion contrary to the facts and to vote contrary to the facts when the bill comes up before the House.

This statement is made in the editorial:

Thousands of children are suffering irreparable wrong by being denied the opportunity to obtain schooling. The law compels parents to send children to school. But Congress fails to provide the schools.

That statement is untrue.

I call your attention to the report of the District Commissioners to Congress, which we have before us now for the fiscal year 1927, page 18.

This report of the school officials, transmitted to Congress by the commissioners, shows that we have to-day 73,212 sittings available in the public schools. That is exclusive of the portables and rented buildings. But, including portable and rented buildings, we have to-day available 75,063 sittings, to take care of a registration of 67,899 children.

The editorial says: "Although there are 67,899 children enrolled in the public schools, there are accommodations for only one-half that number." That statement is untrue. In addition to these figures that I have just given, let me call your attention also to the fact that we are building now under the present appropriation bill in the District of Columbia—that for 1928—65 classrooms for elementary children and high schools to take care of 4,675 additional pupils. The bill that my committee is now considering has before it recommendations that we build 80 schoolrooms for elementary grades and high schools, taking care of a total of 3,450 additional pupils, or, in addition to the present sittings in the District of Columbia, Congress has authorized, or there is pending before the committee, requests for accommodations for 8,125 additional pupils.

Or with present authorizations and present Budget Bureau requests pending before the Committee on Appropriations, we will have 83,188 seats in the District of Columbia to take care of less than 68,000 registered students to-day in the District schools, or deducting portables, 80,337.

The person who wrote that editorial in the Washington Post, if he knows anything about the schools of the District of Columbia, knows that his statement is false.

Children are approaching the high-school age with their primary instruction only half completed.

And that we are running part-time classes in the District of Columbia. There are some part-time classes in the first and second grades, and in the kindergarten we have some part-time classes. We have 10 part-time classes in the schools in the third grade. But, with that exception, beginning with the third grade and running on to completion in the normal schools, there is not a child in the District of Columbia who is compelled to go part time in the schools, and there is not a child in the District of Columbia to-day that is being denied the opportunity to go to school, and there is not a child approaching high-school age without adequate primary instruction due to the failure of Congress to appropriate money for schools. They state that—

In the estimates now pending before Congress there are no items for new school sites, although they are needed in many parts of the District.

That statement is likewise untrue. If the editor of the Washington Post had read the present bill he would have known it, for the present bill carries two items for important and needed sites.

They state that "the five-year building program is $11,000,000 behind." That statement is likewise untrue. Congress authorized—not required—the expenditure of approximately $20,000,000 over five years for school buildings and grounds. We have two years of that yet to cover. Several millions will be spent during those two years for schools which must be deducted from the $11,000,000 of the $20,000,000 total. Three years have been covered out of the five with appropriations of $9,250,000. The present bill carries an additional $2,500,000.

The editorial says:

No complaint is made that the high-school accommodations are inadequate. There is room in the high schools, because a heavy proportion of the primary-school children have failed to obtain sufficient instruction to be ready for high school. These youths, robbed of their right to obtain public-school education, and having reached the age where they are ashamed to remain in classes with little children, are going out into the world poorly equipped for their life work.

That statement is not true.

Doctor Ballou, the superintendent of schools, testified before the committee last year that we had an excess of high-school accommodations, due to the fact that they had overestimated the probable needs for high-school facilities in the District of Columbia. You will find that testimony on page 594 of the hearings of last year.

Doctor Ballou came before the House committee last week and was specifically asked—after calling his attention to the fact that the present Budget carries $700,000 in the school total for the beautification of the grounds of buildings, for gymnasiums, and auditoriums—whether he would prefer that we change the use of that $700,000 and spend it for additional classrooms in the District of Columbia. He said no, that he wanted that money spent as the Budget recommended it be spent. Then we asked him, if we could find money some place else in the bill that we could divert to the schools, whether he had any recommendations as to where it should go, and he recommended that the first need in the schools to-day was not for more classrooms to be put in this bill, but that we buy a site in southwest Washington for a junior high school. That it was the most urgent item and that additional buildings were not more urgent. Regarding last year's bill he told us—and you will find this on page 509 of the hearings—that the bill—was the most satisfactory school budget that had yet been presented to Congress.

We had before us this year the representatives of the Citizens' Advisory Council. Doctor Havenner stated:

I want to say the bill passed last year is the best bill, so far as I know, we ever had in all of my civic career.

Then Mr. Hege, speaking likewise for the Citizens' Advisory Council about the bill we are now considering, said:

Now, the school-building program we are satisfied with; you are giving us more classrooms now, this year, under this bill, than we have ever had, and that will help immensely.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. I give you this, gentlemen, because I know you men are interested in seeing that we maintain an adequate school system in the city of Washington. The editorial to which I have referred is so patently false, so maliciously false, that I deemed it my duty, on the advice of the members of my committee, to call it to the attention of the House. The "shame and disgrace" is that the schools and children of Washington should be libeled as this article libels them.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Nebraska have another minute, because I want to ask him a question.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. There are going to the Washington schools over 3,000 children who live in Virginia and Maryland, and who are not only furnished their tuition but their free textbooks. I notice the gentleman said we have only 68,000 children and he was providing seating arrangements for 83,000. Is he expecting to take in all the balance of the children from Virginia and Maryland who are not now going to school in the District of Columbia?

Mr. SIMMONS. There are at the present time about 2,500 children from Virginia and Maryland in the Washington schools.

If they were removed, the crowded schools, necessitating part-time classes in many instances, would be relieved; but they are not being removed and are being educated at the expense of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANTON. There were 3,100 last year, according to the report I have, but they may have been reduced this year to 2,500.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes on the same subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object to the gentleman having 10 minutes, but this is the Consent Calendar and some of us have been doing a great deal of work on it. I ask the Members to take that into consideration, and if other Members ask permission to address the House I shall feel obliged to object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Speaker, in line with what the gentleman from Nebraska has just said, I want to call your attention to an editorial appearing in the Washington Herald of Friday, February 3, accompanied by some pictures of school buildings here in the city of Washington. The editorial is headed:

Some pictures that prove Capital City's disgrace.

I shall only read a part of it:

Here are pictures of two schoolhouses, out on the north border of Washington, where the boundary line divides the District of Columbia from Maryland.

One picture shows a four-room, modern, up-to-date, brick, properly heated, correctly lighted school. The other shows the type of one-room frame portable structures of which 75 are in use in the District.

These one-room makeshifts are badly lighted, ill ventilated, insanitary, and heated by old-fashioned stoves near the center of the room. In cold weather the children attending such a school are toasted on one side and develop chilblains on the other.

The two buildings shown in the illustration are only a short distance apart. The two portables in the upper picture are in West Takoma Park, on the District of Columbia side of the line. The fine modern structure in the lower picture is on the Maryland side of the line.

Now, coming back to the point the gentleman from Nebraska mentioned. These editorials are misleading and tell only half of the truth. Let me call your attention to the situation. By the side of those two portables, pictured in this paper, there is to-day a 16-room modern school building.

A short distance across from that 16-room school building is the modern building in Maryland that is pictured here. [Indicating.]

Now, what is the rest of the true picture? On last Friday, the 3d day of February, there came across the line from Maryland, from the district served by this Maryland school, and entered the District of Columbia schools 245 children from Maryland, free of charge. If these 245 children were taken out of the school, then these two portables could be abolished, because the District is furnishing facilities in the 16-room building necessary to take care of all the children from the District of Columbia.

Coming to the point raised by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], there appeared in this morning's Post an editorial saying that Dr. Raymond A. Pearson, president of the University of Maryland, had appeared before a committee of this House and asked the Government to make provision for the payment of tuition of residents of the District of Columbia who are attending the University of Maryland without paying tuition. He said that this is unfair to the State of Maryland, because the District of Columbia and the Federal Government are not contributing to the support of his institution. I agree with his statement that it is unfair. He suggests legislation; and I have introduced this morning a bill which authorizes the District Commissioners to enter into an agreement with the State of Maryland whereby an account can be taken of children from the State of Maryland that are coming into the District of Columbia to school, balanced against the residents of the District who are going to the University of Maryland, computed on a per capita cost of operation, and the balance in whosoever favor it may be, to be paid in cash.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLADAY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. My position is that the District children who go to the University of Maryland ought to pay the university, and the Maryland children who go to the District schools ought to pay the District for it.

Mr. HOLADAY. I agree with the gentleman absolutely, and that is what my bill provides.

Mr. BLANTON. Up to this year there were 3,100 children from Virginia and Maryland who were going to the Washington schools free. Of course, the number has been reduced, as the gentleman from Nebraska has said, to about 2,500 this year.

Mr. HOLADAY. There are to-day 2,582 nonresident pupils in the District of Columbia schools, of whom 57 are paying tuition.

Mr. BLANTON. And last year there were 3,100.

Mr. HOLADAY. Why 57 out of the 2,582 are paying tuition I do not know. Practically all of them come from the States of Maryland and Virginia. All of the 2,582 are from those two States, except there is 1 pupil each from California, Connecticut, Idaho, and Illinois and 2 each from New York, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia.

If the policy which I have proposed is adopted, every portable that is now in use in the city of Washington can be abolished because Congress and the District officials to-day are furnishing suitable accommodations for all of the resident pupils of the District. [Applause.]

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLADAY. I yield.

Mr. KETCHAM. Is the gentleman in position to state whether or not all the portables that are listed here are to be found near the boundary lines and that their erection and use is caused by the fact that these pupils come from the outside or are the portables scattered quite generally over the city?

Mr. HOLADAY. They are not scattered quite generally. I would say that to a large extent they are along the District line, although that is not absolutely true.

Mr. KETCHAM. One further question. Would the gentleman go so far in his bill as to require the children of parents, who live outside of the District and for the most part go out there in order to have certain advantages in cheaper living, to pay tuition if their parents are employed and have their entire business here in the District?

Mr. HOLADAY. I can see no reason why there should be a different situation with reference to the District of Columbia and Maryland and Virginia than exists between Michigan and Indiana or Indiana and Illinois.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLADAY. I yield.

Mr. CRAMTON. I may say to the gentleman that I have had a bill some three years, I think, before the District Committee, to relieve the District from this unjust burden. I think my experience is likely to be the experience of the gentleman from Illinois with his bill. The chairman of that committee being from Maryland and concerned first with the interests of his district—I think I ought to break the news gently to my friend from Illinois not to expect any sudden action by the District Committee that will be adverse to the district represented by the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. ZIHLMAN. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. And especially in view of the fact that the associate chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] is likewise interested.

Mr. HOLADAY. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan I had some suspicion of that condition, but the president of the University of Maryland comes here and wants relief. I agree with him. He is right and he should have relief, but at the same time I think we are fair in saying to him, "We will pay you and you pay us and we will strike a balance and wherever a cash payment may be due, let it be paid."

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. HOLADAY. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. Do I understand the gentleman would make no distinction between these young men, for instance, who have come to the age where possibly they may earn a part of their tuition and these little chaps, the children of these people who live on the outside? Their parents, for the most part, are men that are having all they can do to make ends meet now, and yet this great Government that employs them is made a party to this arrangement which the gentleman contemplates in his bill, of taxing these men the amounts necessary to pay this tuition, in addition to the expenses that are already more than they can bear. I must confess that in that regard I am with the chairman of the District Committee, and, more than that, I want to say I shall take great pleasure in joining with others in seeing that these little fellows have their chance.

Mr. HOLADAY. The question of these little fellows' having their chance is not involved.

Mr. KETCHAM. It is.

Mr. HOLADAY. The simple question is whether or not the State of Maryland, collecting its school funds, shall provide adequate school facilities or shall the District of Columbia furnish those facilities. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KETCHAM. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. And whether the Government clerk who lives in the District and pays taxes for schools for his children shall, in addition, pay taxes to support schools for the children of other Government clerks who live in Maryland. [Applause.]

Mr. HOLADAY. That is the question.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLADAY. I will.

Mr. KETCHAM. Referring to the question the gentleman has just raised in responding to my colleague from Michigan, I am here to say that any resident of the District of Columbia pays such a small tax in school matters in contrast with any other municipality of comparable size that it is a matter too small to argue about.

MIDDLE RIO GRANDE CONSERVANCY DISTRICT

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill recently passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, by my motion Senate bill 700 was substituted for House bill 70 and amended. The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to execute an agreement with the middle Rio Grande conservancy district providing for conservation, irrigation, drainage, and flood control for the Pueblo Indian lands in the Rio Grande Valley, N. Mex.

The lands now under irrigation by the Indians, due to the indifferent and ancient method of irrigation pursued for centuries by these Indians, have become water-logged, alkalied, and largely nonproductive. A modern method of drainage canals and laterals will reclaim to the Indians this land. It is contemplated that not only their present lands under cultivation will be reclaimed but an additional 15,000 acres of land for the future benefit of the Indians. This land is not irrigated at this time; it has a very low valuation, and is used only for grazing purposes at a small rental per acre. If reclaimed, it should be worth from $150 to $200 per acre, and will return a rental each year of from $7 to $10 per acre.

It is from the last-mentioned 15,000 acres of Indian land to be reclaimed that the Government will by this bill get its repayment charges for the cost of reclaiming same.

You might as well ask the question, What contention justifies this Government expenditure? Principally to meet the conservancy district in which the city of Albuquerque, the largest city of the State, having a population of 30,000, is located. In this city the Santa Fe Railroad has its largest railroad shop on its main line between Topeka, Kans., and Los Angeles, Calif. This city, in connection with four other towns, the railroad company, and the entire population, formed a conservancy district, and is proposing to bond same to carry forward the proposition of drainage, flood control, and reclamation for the valley, which land is interspersed with the Indian lands of six pueblos.

The valley adjoining Albuquerque and extending a distance of 150 miles from White Rock, on the north, to San Marcial, on the south, and from 1 to 5 miles wide, is the area needing drainage and reclaiming. All conditions are favorable for success; the soil is a sandy loam, and by properly draining same is very productive; all grains and vegetable crops of the north Temperate Zone can be grown here; cultivation was begun in this valley by the Spanish settlers more than 300 years ago, and by the Pueblo Indians for centuries back. This is not new development and cultivation, but there is a need for drainage, flood control, and reclamation to restore the fertility of the land, which has been indifferently irrigated for centuries.

All fruits common to the altitude of the locality can be grown; some 10,000 grapevines are now under production. Alfalfa can be grown to the extent of five crops per year; tobacco is raised, a new variety is now being produced here for insecticide purposes and especially used in dipping cattle and sheep, for which there is a very ready market in the southwest stock country. The plant grown here produces a very great yield per acre, and the whole plant, stalk and leaves, are used for nicotine. Four hundred acres were planted in tobacco this past year; the plant grew to a great height where protected from late frosts and permitted to develop it reached a height of 11½ feet. This tobacco culture yielded gross per acre as high as $800. The soil, due to the great silt deposit, apparently has the properties for furnishing the elements for this great production. This quality of tobacco offers wonderful opportunities for the growth of the product in this valley. The yield of nicotine from the plant is 13 per cent. The labor for the growth and care of this product is easily had in the valley; this is especially true of the Indian people, who have a knowledge of irrigation and can readily be trained to the cultivation and care of the tobacco.

This valley, due to its climatic, soil, and irrigation conditions, is destined to become one of the great agricultural and horticultural districts of the western country. The growing season in the valley is from 189 days in the northern end to 198 days in the lower end.

The previous Congress appropriated $50,000 for the survey of the Indian lands and for the preparation of plans for necessary development in conjunction with the carrying forward of this work within the district. These plans have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

The entire lands within the district number 210,000 acres; the area to be reclaimed and drained will be approximately 129,000 acres; the Indian land is approximately 23,000 acres, or about 18 per cent of the entire area.

Of this tract there are some 8,342 acres that the Indians cultivate at this time, and which have been cultivated for a period of years running into the centuries. The new land reclaimed will be 15,000 acres. As stated before, it is from the last-mentioned land that the Government will get its return for the money thus expended in behalf of the Indians. Climate and soil conditions are such in this valley that the land can be readily leased; there is a home market for all products that the valley will raise. The total cost of irrigating, drainage improvements, flood control, and so forth, of the whole area is estimated at $11,829,000; the Indian share is $1,593,311.

The total population is 50,000 people. Albuquerque is the largest city, but there are many smaller towns and villages, all within the district, which need this legislation in order that their work for flood control, drainage, and reclamation will go forward. The Indian population is, for the entire six pueblos which intersperse the white lands, some 3,500 people.

Albuquerque seeks to advance its development by assisting this proposed legislation, and in turn it will be assisted by said legislation. The city feels that this effort upon the part of the Government, in assisting with the Indian part of the necessary funds, will be doing a service to the middle Rio Grande Valley; in turn the Government is doing much for the future of these Indians in reclaiming and placing the lands in a position for successful cultivation.

The bill has the approval of the Government; a department survey in the field has been made; expert engineers have reported that the plan is feasible, economical, and of great benefit to the six Indian pueblos. The immediate and urgent necessity for this legislation is the fact that the district is anxious to proceed with the issuance of its bonds, and to proceed at once in carrying out the proposed plans. To do this the Indian lands within the district which will receive the benefits require the passage of this legislation. The district has spent $300,000 in surveys, testing sites for dams, and so forth, and the Government has contributed its share of $50,000. The plan proposed by the legislation if thus approved will hasten development.

In the passage of this legislation adequate protection is given to the Indians, both as to priorities and the use of water, with a limitation of costs. It also protects the Indians from losing any lands by the enforcement of any lien to the Government while title to the lands is held in Indian ownership.

The generous effort made on the part of the Government in backing the legislation ought to bring forward at a more rapid advancement a change from the primitive life that these Indians have persisted in maintaining for centuries, and will hasten the period in which they will enter into the activities of citizenship, as citizens in the full sense of the word, in the State and Nation.

CLAIMS OF POSTMASTERS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 325) repealing existing law requiring the Postmaster General to report action taken on claims of postmasters.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, this bill seeks to repeal the law which requires the Postmaster General to report to Congress his action on claims for losses. I want to remind gentlemen of what the President said at the Press Club the other night, that the people's greatest safeguard in the world is publicity. Now, they are seeking to repeal this provision for publicity. And I am against this bill, and object to its passage.

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

AMENDING SECTION 5 OF THE ACT OF MARCH 2, 1895

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7030) to amend section 5 of the act of March 2, 1895.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman if he is prepared to offer an amendment in reference to the United States Code?

Mr. KELLY. I will say that that has been provided for, and an amendment will be offered.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, I want to point out that section 815 of title 29, United States Code, is in the act approved March 8. What reference does the gentleman propose to give?

Mr. KELLY. Title 6, section 3, is the amendment I propose to offer.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Has the gentleman compared the section?

Mr. KELLY. Yes; it is title 6, section 3.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think the gentleman will find himself in conflict.

Mr. KELLY. It was compared by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER] and myself.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of the act of March 2, 1895, chapter 177, is amended by the addition of the following:

"Provided, That the payment and acceptance of the annual premium on corporate surety bonds furnished by postal officers and employees shall be a compliance with the requirement for the renewal of such bonds within the meaning of this act."

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, at the end of the line after figures "177" insert "(U. S. C. title 6, section 3.)"

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PENSIONS TO DEPUTY MARSHALS OF THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5709) granting a pension to the regularly commissioned United States deputy marshals of the United States District Court for the Western District of Arkansas, including the Indian Territory, now the State of Oklahoma, and to their widows and dependent children.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SNELL). Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, this is a new pension act, and seems to establish a bad precedent. If the gentleman from Arkansas wants to make a statement I will reserve my objection.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I hope I may have the attention of the House while I explain this bill. It appears to be a pension bill of course. The objection was made once that it should have gone to the Committee on Pensions. The reason why the bill was not sent to the Committee on Pensions was that it proposes to pension deputy marshals of the district courts. Hence it properly should have gone to the Committee on the Judiciary, where it has gone. It has been carefully considered on numerous occasions by the Judiciary Committee. There has been extensive hearings at one time. The Judiciary Committee of three separate Congresses have unanimously recommended the passage of the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. The bill says it is to pay a pension.

Mr. TILLMAN. I grant that.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. None of the United States marshals and none of the deputy marshals of the United States in any State are pensioned now.

Mr. TILLMAN. Let me have a little time in that connection to explain.

Mr. BLANTON. In that connection, if we pass this bill, and if we grant a pension of $50 a month to these particular deputy marshals down in Oklahoma——

Mr. TILLMAN. And Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and Texas—and right now, of course, I am particularly interested in what goes on in Texas——

Mr. TILLMAN. And so are we.

Mr. BLANTON. Would not that be letting the camel's nose get under the tent, and would not every one of these deputy marshals and every United States marshal hereafter come in and say, "If you grant a pension to these, do likewise unto us."

Mr. TILLMAN. If I may have just a little time to explain this.

Mr. DYER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SNELL). The gentleman is recognized. This is going on by unanimous consent.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to explain the position of the friends of this bill and to discuss the objection raised by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. Going back a little, Judge Parker, originally an Ohio man, was judge of the western district of Arkansas for a great many years, and he was judge of the biggest criminal court in the world. He had 13,000 criminal cases on his docket at one time. Judge Parker was one of the greatest judges in America. He came from Ohio and went to Missouri. He was then appointed justice of a high court in Utah for a time, and was appointed by President Grant from that post to be judge of the western district of Arkansas. At that time Judge Parker had jurisdiction over the western district of Arkansas, which included the then Indian Territory. Before my friend from Texas, Mr. BLANTON, or my friends from Oklahoma, Mr. HASTINGS, Mr. HOWARD, and Judge SWANK, grew up, that particular section was the wildest country on the face of the earth. There were more robbers, horse thieves, and murderers and bootleggers in that section of the country than any place under the sun.

Mr. CRAMTON rose.

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, let me have just a little time, and then I shall be very glad to yield to my amiable and good-looking friend from Michigan. Judge Parker was the judge of this court, and he had a number of deputy marshals whose business it was to pacify the country and to arrest these dangerous criminals; in fact, to perform military service as much so as any soldier. At that time a woman was not safe, at that time property was not safe, at that time human life was not safe. From all of the States of the Union, practically, murderers, thieves, robbers, and the whisky men gravitated to this particular section. It was the old Indian Territory, rendezvous par excellence of the lawless. They had no churches; they had no local self-government. This able, fearless judge, whom we all revere down there, undertook to pacify this section of country. Eighty men were hanged under Judge Parker's jurisdiction. That simply shows the extent of crime prevalent in the Indian Territory. This was just after the War between the States. The military arm of the Government tried to pacify the country. It was powerless to do so. These deputy marshals were men who had come out of the Confederate and Union Armies. They were appointed deputy marshals for the purpose of pacifying that country, and they did so. Sixty-five of them were killed in this dangerous service. They worked for a mere pittance. This was a military service which they performed, and that is why I say they ought to be pensioned. There are 25 or 30 of them alive, tottering old men, poor, afflicted, old. They performed this service for almost nothing.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. To show the conditions that prevailed in that jurisdiction, is it not a fact that in the history of the world there is no record of where one judge sentenced more people to execution than Judge Parker did?

Mr. TILLMAN. That is true, and that is why we respect him. He was equal to a difficult occasion. He sentenced murderers, and they were executed, and that splendid country has been redeemed, and now constitutes the State of Oklahoma. Personally I have very little interest in this bill. I think there are perhaps two or three of these old, blind, decrepit marshals in my district, perhaps in my county. The bulk of them are over in Oklahoma and in Texas and in a few surrounding States.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Section 2 of this bill reads as follows:

That the pension herein provided for shall be computed from the date of the commission issued by the Department of Justice upon which the application is based.

That seems to provide for a back pension.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is an error. That is to say, I drew the bill from the old one first introduced. The report says it is not to be retroactive. I shall accept an amendment to provide that this pension shall not be retroactive.

Mr. LEHLBACH. This section should be stricken out.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; I would be glad to offer that amendment myself. I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAMTON. Oh, I think the occasion has passed.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. There are many ex-sheriffs in the gentleman's State, in Oklahoma, and in my State, who have performed similar service to that mentioned by the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas. Is he going to pension all of them because they did their duty?

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, I do not want to be unreasonable, but I want you to allow this bill to go through with the amendment suggested by the gentleman from New Jersey, which I shall offer myself. In that connection I ask to amend the bill——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is not reported yet. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all of us sympathize with the situation that is referred to in this bill, but at the same time it furnishes a precedent entirely outside of anything to which we have been accustomed. It selects and singles out about two men, as I understand from the gentleman from Arkansas——

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, more than that.

Mr. HOOPER. Five, perhaps.

Mr. BLANTON. No; there are a bunch of them.

Mr. HOOPER. I understood the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN] to say there are but two.

Mr. TILLMAN. From my county there are but two or three, but throughout the country there are more, perhaps 30.

Mr. HOOPER. They are not soldiers, although they undoubtedly performed as courageous a service as any soldier would perform. Yet they are not in a situation of such a kind as that they can be recognized as soldiers. We pension them as soldiers, but not when they are United States marshals.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his reservation of the right to object? I want to make a statement.

Mr. HOOPER. Yes; I will withhold it. But, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the precedent that would be established by the enactment of this bill would be dangerous in the extreme. It would open up the floodgates to all sorts of bills that would be introduced here, and this would be pointed to as a precedent. While I reserve the right to object at the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma and others, I shall object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan reserves the right to object.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I think there is a misapprehension in regard to the setting of a precedent by the passing of this bill. I want to direct the attention of the House to the fact that this court was a special court. It was created by Congress for a specific purpose, and while it was located in the State of Arkansas it had no jurisdiction in that State at all.

I want to say further that this can not be regarded as a precedent, because there never has been and there never will be again a set of United States marshals working under the same conditions as these. They were the trail blazers of civilization. This court was established for the purpose of bringing civilization into that country. This judge was appointed, and when their work was done and this court dissolved these marshals went out of employment and were, as a matter of fact, special officers of the Government for a special cause during their employment.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I will be very glad to.

Mr. CRAMTON. The precedent would consist not in the number of bills that might come in affecting United States marshals, but a precedent of passing a bill giving a pension to these United States marshals would be objectionable from the fact that many classes of civilian officials might urge a similar pension, and this would constitute a precedent for them.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I want to call attention to this: These marshals for whom we are appealing here were in a special court which was created because we realized the necessity for a court of that kind in order to carry out this work. They put on these marshals because if soldiers had been put in control of this work they could not have reached those people. If soldiers had done the work that these marshals did we would be pensioning them to-day. I say we have had none like this before and will have none in the future.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think the gentleman from Oklahoma has used an unfortunate illustration when he referred to soldiers. If Regular Army soldiers had performed that duty it is not certain that they would have received any pension, and certainly not $50 a month. They would have received a pension only for injuries incurred in the line of duty and not as much as $50 a month.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I will say that these United States marshals received disabilities in the line of duty.

Mr. TILLMAN. As a matter of fact, soldiers did try to pacify that country, and then it was requested that the marshals be given a free hand, and they went in and did the work. I call attention to the testimony here, where it is stated that several times soldiers did attempt to pacify the country and failed.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. In order that it may be made a part of the record in this case, I want to read a memorial from one of these United States marshals as to the results of this work—Mr. Frank Cochran, of Oklahoma City.

Mr. CRAMTON. Let me suggest to the gentleman that there are a number of other bills that Members are interested in, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOPER] says he will object to this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I suggest that the gentleman extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. No. I believe it will be a bit of history that Congress will be interested in. It will take only two or three minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Members are interested in passing other bills.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I hope the gentleman from Michigan will not undertake to take me off my feet. I read:

FROM MEMORY OF THE FORT SMITH COURT

By Frank Cochran

The United States Court of the Western District of Arkansas was an entirely different court from the United States district courts of to-day, and the United States marshals that served its processes were altogether different—a different system to work under. Congress established this court. It had jurisdiction in criminal cases over all the Indian Territory from Arkansas west to Colorado and New Mexico, from Kansas to Texas, an area of 74,000 square miles. Less than 100 men kept this vast wilderness practically safe for people who traveled through the country. In 1875 Hon. Isaac C. Parker was appointed judge by Congress. He was judge of this court 21 years. Fourteen of the years there was no appeal from his court. No other court in America was ever vested with such power. Most all criminal cases and the worst criminals that were in the United States. In the 21 years Judge Parker was on the bench 13,500 cases were handled. Nine thousand five hundred of these were convicted or pleaded guilty; 174 were convicted of murder. He sentenced 172 men to death; 88 of these men were hanged. During his term as judge these crimes were all committed in the Indian Territory. The court was situated at Fort Smith, Ark., but had no jurisdiction over crime in that State. Hundreds went to prison for life. * * * We traveled on horseback, slept on the ground, swam rivers (no bridges), carried our "chow" with us. Judge Parker gave us our orders. Processes of his court had to be served. Often we would be 20 to 40 days out serving these papers. We had orders to serve them. We got no salary. We got 6 cents per mile and expenses going, 10 cents returning if we got service. Sixty-five per cent of us were killed or wounded. We took more risks, saw more hardships, than the Army. I believe if the committee all understood the kind of work we did and the kind of country we did it in, they would allow us old boys something, as many of them need it in their old days.

Mr. Speaker, I maintain that this is a different order of affairs. This will not set any precedent, because, as a matter of fact, these people worked for the United States Congress in a special court that Congress created for the purpose of driving civilization farther out into the West and making homes for the settlers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I wish the gentleman would withhold his objection for a moment in order that I may make a statement. It is true that this legislation, if enacted, would set a precedent which, probably, we would not want to come up before us in after years. There is something to that point, but the facts in this case, Mr. Speaker, are such that, in my judgment, they warrant the precedent, owing to the hazardous and dangerous service rendered by these old pioneers of more than half a century ago. For that reason the committee felt it was its duty to submit it to the House, even though it might be considered a precedent for after years. However, we felt it was one the House should consider and pass upon, and we felt the facts warranted the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If we passed this bill and a bill were to come before the gentleman's committee to pension all the United States marshals and deputies, what would the gentleman do with it?

Mr. DYER. We would not consider it, of course.

Mr. BLANTON. You would have to do it if you followed this precedent.

Mr. DYER. We would not do that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But objection is made.

AMENDING SECTION 5 OF THE ACT OF MARCH 2, 1895

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we may return to H. R. 7030, and ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may correct the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, so as to make the amendment read:

Section 3, Title VI, United States Code.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, you can only do that by vacating the proceedings. You can not do it by returning to the bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is the same amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. But you would have to vacate the proceedings.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can do that in a minute. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we vacate the proceedings and that the order of the amendment be reversed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

IRON GATES IN WEST EXECUTIVE AVENUE

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 359) authorizing the presentation of the iron gates in West Executive Avenue between the grounds of the State, War, and Navy Building and the White House to the Ohio State Archeological and Historical Society for the memorial gateways into the Spiegel Grove State Park.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when the gentleman from Ohio becomes governor of that State, will he invite his colleagues to the presentation of these artistic gates?

Mr. BEGG. I will say to the gentleman from New York that he does not need to wait until that future time. I will invite him right now to be my guest at any time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman a question. Are there proper gateways now at the entrance of the grounds to the executive mansion in the capital of the State of Ohio?

Mr. BEGG. I will say to the gentleman that these gates have nothing to do with that.

Mr. BLANTON. If there are not, I think we ought to place these particular ones there.

Mr. BEGG. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that if the time ever comes that I have the key to that particular place he will be welcome and the gates will open up for him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Whereas the Ohio State Archeological and Historical Society, of which Rutherford B. Hayes was the president at the time of his death, has received by deed to the State of Ohio, dated March 30, 1909, the Hayes homestead in Spiegel Grove, Fremont, Ohio, together with all the personal property connected therewith, including his library Americana, without cost, under the simple conditions that the premises should be maintained and used as a State park in which the old French and Indian trail, known as the Sandusky-Scioto Trail, from Lake Erie to the Ohio River, shall be preserved and maintained as a park drive, and that the granite monument designed and erected by Rutherford B. Hayes after the death of Lucy Webb Hayes be transferred to the knoll in Spiegel Grove, and, together with such improvements as shall be made to the entrance of the State park by the donors, be maintained forever; and

Whereas the old French and Indian trail through Spiegel Grove, used by Indian and French explorers and war parties from the St. Lawrence River and the Great Lakes to the Ohio and Mississippi, later used by the British and Indians from Fort Pitt in the campaigns against the French at Detroit, and later still, after the surrender of Detroit, by the French in 1763, by the British against General Harrison in the War of 1812, has heretofore been marked by memorial gate posts, with historical legends, so spaced to receive the gates from West Executive Avenue, which had been voluntarily tendered by President Harding, a former resident of the congressional district; the Congress of the United States had awarded gold medals to Major General Harrison, commanding the Northwestern Army, and to Maj. George Croghan, the gallant defender of Fort Stephenson at Fremont in the War of 1812, and after the Spiegel Grove State Park had been deeded to the State of Ohio for historical purposes the War Department, in recognition of the memorial gateways to be erected in honor of Major General Harrison, commanding the Northwest Army in the War of 1812, and of Major General McPherson, the officer of highest rank and command killed in battle during the war for the Union, and a native of and buried in this county, presented and delivered, free on board cars at Fremont, four 10-inch Rodman cannon and four 15-inch cannon balls to form the upright gateposts and caps of the General Harrison and General McPherson gateways into the Spiegel Grove State Park; the donors of the Spiegel Grove State Park have erected a beautiful Hayes Memorial Building, to which has been added an historical library and museum building, and generously endowed the same, together with funds from a land endowment sufficient to maintain the Hayes homestead, and have placed the management and control of endowment funds for historical endowments and research funds in the Rutherford B. Hayes-Lucy Webb Hayes Foundation, a self-perpetuating body, composed of five trustees for life, viz, the Rev. Dr. W. O. Thompson, president emeritus Ohio State University; the Hon. Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War during the World War; the Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON, Representative in Congress; the Hon. John H. Clarke, former justice of the Supreme Court; and the Hon. Myron T. Herrick, ambassador to France.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all of the bill and insert the following:

"That the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital is hereby authorized and directed to deliver to the Spiegel Grove State Park, Fremont, Ohio, the iron gates now hanging in West Executive Avenue between the grounds of the State, War, and Navy Building and the White House."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

OIL AND GAS PERMITS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5783) to grant extensions of time of oil and gas permits.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question. Why is it necessary to have this extension of two years?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I will say this to the gentleman from Texas, that all previous legislation on the subject has given authority for the granting of permits for a period of two years.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman is seeking an extension of two years.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. There are three classes of permittees, and only one general class will be affected by this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Where did this bill come from?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. This bill has been favorably reported.

Mr. BLANTON. Where did it come from to the gentleman? Where did the gentleman find it?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. It came to me from your former colleague, now in the Senate.

Mr. BLANTON. That is all the gentleman knows about it?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. No; I know a good deal more about it than that.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, for the present, I object.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Will the gentleman withhold his objection and permit me to state the intent of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. There are three general classes of permittees, a permittee who has been granted a permit, who has done a certain amount of exploration work and who has abandoned the permit.

This piece of legislation does not pertain to such a permittee. There is the other class of those who have not been diligent in complying with the law with reference to the amount of work which has to be done, and who, because of their lack of diligence, have had their permits canceled. This legislation does not refer to that class of permittee.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman knows that under every oil and gas lease——

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. This is a permit, not a lease.

Mr. BLANTON. But under every gas and oil lease and under every gas and oil permit there is a provision that where a person has acted in good faith and has used any diligence whatever to preserve his rights there is no cancellation of the lease or permit.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. But the gentleman from Texas will bear in mind that this act refers only to permit and not to leases.

Mr. BLANTON. I catch that; but they are on an equal footing.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon. A permit is for the purpose of exploring, not for the purpose of extracting, because there is nothing to extract.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. COLTON. I am sure the gentleman from Texas is in error. If the Secretary of the Interior or anyone was authorized to grant an extension, this bill would not be here. The time expires automatically. We have never given more than two years.

Mr. BLANTON. The great trouble with such permits is that they are in many instances just like leases, and the parties get these permits to keep somebody else from getting them, and then they never pursue their rights under them at all.

Mr. COLTON. If the gentleman will permit, under the very terms of this bill they must show good faith; they must show that in the first six months after the permit was granted they have drilled 500 feet; they must show that within the two years they have drilled 2,000 feet. Under some of the permits issued they have spent $250,000 or more and have not succeeded in finding oil, and in some of the fields with which I am acquainted some of the companies have withdrawn entirely; others are willing to go ahead and spend more money if we will permit them to do it, and the utmost good faith has been shown and will be required before the Secretary of the Interior will grant an extension.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman any knowledge of the origin of this bill?

Mr. COLTON. I have not, except that it comes from thoroughly reliable sources.

Mr. BLANTON. Who drew it?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. My friend, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman's colleague asked him to introduce it here, but who drew this bill?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Senator HAYDEN of Arizona drew this bill just as he drew the bill which was introduced in 1926 and which was passed by this House.

Mr. BLANTON. I have such confidence in the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], Mr. Speaker, that I withdraw my reservation of objection. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to suggest that when the gentleman from Texas comes to know this gentleman from Arizona [Mr. DOUGLAS], he will have similar confidence in him. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any oil or gas prospecting permit issued under the act entitled "An act to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain," approved February 25, 1920, or extended under the act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant extensions of time under oil and gas permits, and for other purposes," approved January 11, 1922, and April 5, 1926, may be extended by the Secretary of the Interior for an additional period of two years, if he shall find that the permittee has been unable, with the exercise of reasonable diligence, to begin drilling operations or to drill wells of the depth and within the time required by existing law, and has failed to discover oil or gas, and desires to prosecute further exploration.

SEC. 2. Upon application to the Secretary of the Interior, and subject to valid intervening rights and to the provisions of section 1 of this act, any permit which has already expired because of lack of authority under existing law to make further extensions may be extended for a period of two years from the date of the passage of this act.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 9, after "1922," strike out the word "and" and insert the words "or as further extended under the act of."

Page 1, at the end of line 5, insert the words "or has drilled wells of the depth and within the time required by existing law."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL DUTIES OF TERRITORIAL OFFICERS OF ALASKA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8284) to authorize the payment of amounts appropriated by the Legislature of Alaska on account of additional duties imposed upon territorial officers.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I object.

DAM ACROSS THE KANSAS (KAW) RIVER AT LAWRENCE, KANS.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5569) relative to the dam across the Kansas (Kaw) River, at Lawrence, in Douglas County, Kans.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice the report from the War Department directs attention to the jurisdiction of the Federal Power Commission. Has the gentleman given consideration to that?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, the Secretary merely calls attention to the fact that it is under their jurisdiction. It has been given full consideration by the committee. This bill only authorizes repairing the dam. This dam was built back in 1872, before there was any Federal law governing such structures, and because of that fact they hold that this legislation is necessary.

Mr. CRAMTON. So it is not an increase in the structure?

Mr. DENISON. No; just a permit to repair the dam.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the assent of the United States be, and is hereby, given to the Bowersock Mill & Power Co., a partnership, owners of the Bowersock Dam, constructed across the Kansas (Kaw) River at Lawrence, Douglas, Kans., in 1872 and 1873, and to their successors and assigns, without further authority from the United States, to maintain the said dam and to repair and improve the same as provided in the order of the public service commission of the State of Kansas, issued on the 2d day of July, 1926, in accordance with the statutes of said State, and to maintain the said dam as repaired and improved with a permanent crest at 808 feet above sea level and flashboards at 812 feet above sea level, expressly reserving to the United States, however, the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act as the needs of navigation may hereafter require: Provided, however, That this act shall not have the effect of changing in any manner the liability of the owners of said dam for injury or damages to adjacent property.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 3, strike out the word "assent" and insert the word "consent" in lieu thereof.

Page 1, line 6, after the word "Douglas," insert the word "County."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE OUACHITA RIVER AT HARRISONBURG, LA.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5727) granting the consent of Congress to the Louisiana Highway Commission to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ouachita River at or near Harrisonburg, La.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, this bill is in the usual form, the standard form provided by the committee, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered as having been read, the committee amendments agreed to, the bill ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois for some information. There are 70 bridge bills on this calendar if I have counted them correctly. My observation has been that a bridge bill is one of the rarest to arouse opposition in the House. What is the obstacle in the way of saving the time of the House by putting bridge bills into an omnibus bill as we do pension bills and claim bills?

Mr. DENISON. In reply to the gentleman I will say that it seems to the committee impracticable. We have 10 different forms for bridge bills, depending on the type of the bridge that is to be constructed. For instance, we have a form for a free bridge, one for a toll bridge, a different form for a railroad bridge, a different form for a bridge built by the public, like State, county, or municipality, a different form where a private company wants to build a bridge, a different form for an individual, and also a form for an international bridge, a different form for an interstate and one for intrastate. I think it will be impractical to try to combine them in an omnibus bill.

Mr. LUCE. Where would be the difficulty in making 10 paragraphs in the bill? Does it not seem to the gentleman that some way could be devised to save having to go through this routine or motion 70 times?

Mr. DENISON. I have just suggested one way that we could save time. We now have a standard form for these various kinds of bridge bills, and we are asking that time may be saved by not reading them individually but passing them as rapidly as possible.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is called for. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended.

BRIDGE BILLS

The following bridge bills were severally considered, the committee amendments agreed to, the bills as amended were ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, were read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table:

HOSPITAL AT DAYTON SOLDIERS' HOME

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, a while ago there was an agreement to pass over H. R. 132 for 30 minutes. That time has passed, and I think the matter ought to be disposed of if it is going to be disposed of to-day.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman alludes to the bill where we were trying to get some information from the Budget. We have been unable to do so up to this time.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman from Mississippi has matters extraneous to the Budget.

Mr. CRAMTON. Well, the gentleman can offer those.

Mr. BLANTON. It might make the action of the Budget immaterial.

Mr. CRAMTON. Under the order of the House it was to go over until we got the information from the Budget.

Mr. RANKIN. I want to ask if the gentleman has any assurance that we are going to get a report from the Budget to-day?

Mr. CRAMTON. I anticipate so; yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Would not the gentleman from Michigan agree to have this bill passed over without prejudice until another day?

Mr. CRAMTON. I suggested that and there was some objection.

Mr. RANKIN. There is going to be considerable controversy over it in its present form. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that this bill (H. R. 132) be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

H. R. 8900. A bill granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of the State of Alabama to construct a bridge across the Tombigbee River near Gainesville on the Gainesville-Eutaw road between Sumter and Greene Counties, Ala.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT PRAIRIE DU CHIEN, WIS.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5818) granting the consent of Congress to J. H. Peacock, F. G. Bell, S. V. Taylor, E. C. Amann, and C. E. Ferris to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Prairie du Chien, Wis.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill as amended.

Mr. DENISON. I ask unanimous consent that the reading be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri: At the end of section 7 add the following: "Provided, That bonds or other securities issued against or based on the construction and revenues of said bridge and approaches will not exceed the actual cost of such construction and operation, economically made, plus a maximum of 10 per cent added thereto, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, prior to the issue of any such bonds or other securities to determine the total thereof which may thus be issued."

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, this is the first bill that has been reached where the consent of Congress is granted to individuals to construct a bridge.

For the benefit of the Members who did not hear my remarks this morning, I will say that the purpose of the amendment is to give protection to the individuals who buy the securities to make possible the building of the bridge. The bill gives protection to the city, county, and State, so far as the purchase of the bridge after completion is concerned. As the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] stated to-day, there are over 70 bills on the calendar and about half of them grant the consent of Congress to individuals or corporations to build bridges.

The Secretary of War is called upon after the completion of the bridge to set a valuation on the structure, and it is done for the purpose of allowing the city, county, or State to buy the bridge if it so desires. Now, for example, suppose the Secretary of War, after the bridge is completed, places a valuation of a million dollars on the structure and bonds have been issued and sold to the value of $1,500,000, the people who bought the bonds hold the bag for $500,000. I want the value placed on the bridge prior to construction and limit the amount of securities that can be issued to that amount, plus 10 per cent, which should certainly satisfy the promoter and will at the same time protect the people who buy the bonds from inflation.

This does not mean the defeat of any of your bills on the calendar to-day. I want that distinctly understood. If my amendment is agreed to, you can proceed to pass the bills and add the amendment to all. If my amendment is defeated, I will abide by the decision of the House and not object to the consideration of the bills. I will, however, try to force a record vote. I feel that the same protection should be given to the individual who makes the building of the bridge possible before a bridge is erected as is given to the city, county, or State after the bridge is completed.

With this explanation, Mr. Speaker, I am ready for a vote on my amendment.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to add anything to what I said earlier in the afternoon with reference to the point raised by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN]; but since I made those remarks I have received a telegram which I want to read to the House and insert in the RECORD, because I feel that when it is done the gentleman from Missouri will feel satisfied that his point has been fully met.

I stated in my remarks a while ago that the blue sky law of Missouri fully protects the people in regard to bridge securities sold in the State of Missouri. I sent a telegram out to the secretary of state of Missouri in order to be absolutely sure that my construction of their blue sky law was right. I made the statement that their blue sky law would protect their people in the cases the gentleman mentioned, but I wanted to be sure about that, and so I sent a telegram to the secretary of state, and I have received his answer, which is as follows:

JEFFERSON CITY, MO., February 6, 1928.

E. E. DENISON,

Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

Securities issued by private corporations for funds to construct bridges must be qualified under the securities act of this State before they can be sold.

F. T. STOCKARD, Commissioner.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I received the same telegram, but this morning I read to the House a statement, and I told the gentleman from Illinois that I had secured that statement from a man who is constructing a bridge in my city to-day, in which he says that the bonds for the construction of his bridge were not subject to the blue sky law of our State. They were listed through the Chicago Stock Exchange, and I understand the blue sky law does not require direct application where stock or bond issue is listed on such an exchange. I read that statement this morning, and it comes from a gentleman who is constructing a bridge at this time.

Mr. DENISON. I sent this telegram on Saturday in order to find out the views of the State officials, and this telegram that I have received is from the State official charged with administering their blue sky law.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I have a telegram from a man who serves under the secretary of state. But I am citing the case of a man who is constructing a bridge and he says that the bonds for the construction of that bridge are not under the control of the blue sky law of my State, and that is the reason why I offered the amendment. If he had advised me otherwise I would not have offered the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 5, noes 75.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. There was a large number who did not vote. Did the Chair count them?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count the Members present. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-six gentlemen are present—not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the amendment to the committee will answer "yea" when their names are called; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 18, nays 315, not voting 100, as follows:

HOSPITAL AT DAYTON SOLDIERS' HOME

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I rise for a parliamentary purpose. It seems that earlier in the day the Speaker announced that a certain bill would be held in abeyance for 30 minutes while somebody was going out to find out what the Director of the Bureau of the Budget thought about it. Now, the 30 minutes have expired, and when it comes to a problem of building hospitals for soldiers, who are confined in a building which is admittedly a fire trap, I am not in favor of waiting even 30 minutes for the Director of the Bureau of the Budget to report. I would like to have that report now, according to the order of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will inform the gentleman that during his absence unanimous consent was granted that that bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order for us to ascertain whether there will be any suspensions this afternoon?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair at the present time does not know of any.

The following bridge bills were severally considered, the committee amendments agreed to, the bills as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, were read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table:

H. R. 8837. A bill granting the consent of Congress to the American Bridge & Ferry Co. (Inc.), its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River;

H. R. 8726. A bill granting the consent of Congress to Oscar Baertch, Christ Buhmann, and Fred Reiter, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River;

H. R. 449. A bill granting the consent of Congress to the Louisiana Highway Commission, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Atchafalaya River; and

H. R. 5501. A bill granting the consent of Congress to the Hermann Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE OHIO RIVER

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 472) granting the consent of Congress to Dwight P. Robinson & Co. (Inc.), its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BRAND of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. BRAND of Ohio. I will.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the bill to which objection has been made is H. R. 472, granting Dwight P. Robinson & Co. the right to build a bridge between Maysville, Ky., and Aberdeen, Ohio. I certainly hope that the reservation of objection will be withdrawn. I would like to state that at the last session of Congress such a bill, together with a bill introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS], passed the House by unanimous consent, but failed of passage in the Senate. So far as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] and myself are concerned there is no difference of opinion at this time. Neither will submit an objection to the bill of the other. My bill held first position on the calendar last year. He did not object to my bill and I did not object to his bill. The bill which follows H. R. 472 on this calendar is a bill which was introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] granting permission to the Maysville Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across the Ohio River between Maysville, Ky., and Aberdeen, Ohio, the same points. It has been stated upon several occasions that the Kearns bill, or the Maysville Bridge Co. bill, is a combination bill in that it permits the building of a bridge for railroad and vehicular purposes, but I state that the bill which comes before us for consideration (H. R. 437) does not contain the combination feature. It is in identic language, so far as power is concerned, with the bill which is under consideration at this time.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. KEARNS. It is true that the committee did amend my bill so that it destroyed the combination feature of the bill, but that did not come to my attention until this morning. I have now seen the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] and he has prepared an amendment which will make my bill a combination bill—that is, it will provide for a railroad and vehicular bridge.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If I recall correctly, at the last session of Congress it was the position of the gentleman from Ohio that a bill granting the right to construct a bridge across the Ohio River carried with it the right to build a combination bridge.

Mr. KEARNS. That was my position, because I was told that by members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If that is the condition I submit that H. R. 472, the bill under discussion now, would be inclusive of the right to build a combination bridge.

Mr. KEARNS. But your company, if the gentleman will permit, does not intend and would not build a combination bridge; that is, a railroad and vehicular bridge.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I think the gentleman goes a trifle far because my understanding is that the gentlemen who seek the permit under my bill would build a combination bridge if the matter were submitted to them in substantial form.

Mr. KEARNS. Why do they not then introduce such a bill?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Because the gentleman last year took the position that an ordinary bridge bill included the right to build a vehicular bridge. I do not take the position that these people under this bill intend to build a combination bridge. My statement was that if the matter was presented to them in substantial form I felt certain they would be glad to listen to it. They are one of the largest bridge constructors in this country and would be glad to construct any bridge that economic conditions justify.

Mr. KEARNS. What does the gentleman mean by "substantial form"?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Oh, substance rather than dreams; realities rather than visions.

Mr. KEARNS. They claim now they want a vehicular bridge and nothing else.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That is what they seek under this bill.

Mr. KEARNS. The Maysville Bridge Co. declare they want to build a combination bridge and have introduced such a bill.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Their bill is identical in language with the bill before us, if the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEARNS. I understand that, but the bill was introduced for a combined bridge; and the committee, without my knowing anything about it, struck out the railroad part of it and made it a vehicular bridge.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Would the gentleman from Ohio want a bill to pass Congress permitting the construction of a combined bridge between these two points with a recapture clause in it? That is what you have in this bill under consideration now.

Mr. KEARNS. But it is going to be amended on the floor of the House.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The bill which the gentleman introduced had a recapture clause in it.

Mr. KEARNS. The bill I introduced provided for a combination bridge.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. And carried a recapture clause.

Mr. KEARNS. The committee struck out the combined-bridge language and did not amend it properly. This was all done without my knowledge.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I would like to say to the House I have not opposed the bill of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] either in the last session or now.

Mr. KEARNS. I did not oppose the gentleman's bill. But since the gentleman from Kentucky has drawn me into this controversy, I must say that it is apparent to me that a combined bridge would better serve the people than would a single bridge.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I do not see how I have drawn you into controversy. I am not opposing it, but it seems to me that, in view of the splendid utterances of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], heard upon the floor of this Congress when he said there should be no monopoly, there should be no exclusive rights given to any individual or any corporation in order that they might go around and barter and sell such rights; we should take heed and not permit a monopoly and an exclusive right to come from this Congress to-day. I only desire the passage of both bills.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I have no particular interest in the matter except as it involves an opportunity to open a great market for Kentucky coal in my own State and through to the lake ports. I understand we have before us two bills, both to build bridges across the Ohio River at the same point, one, H. R. 472, by my friend from Kentucky, providing a vehicular bridge only, and the other bill, H. R. 437, by Mr. KEARNS, introduced for a combined vehicular and railroad bridge, which would bring about railroad facilities by which we can market more of Kentucky's coal through Ohio and to the world. For this reason I was interested in the railroad feature of the bridge. I was told that if the present bill, H. R. 472, now before the House were passed it would end all opportunity of getting a railroad bridge. I was called on the phone by my good friend from Kentucky, who said, when I told him this, that it was a bluff. I then said to these gentlemen who were asking that the subsequent bill to this, H. R. 437, only be passed—that is, the one introduced by my friend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS]—to get proof of that fact, and I have been furnished with an affidavit quoting from the contract by which the combination bridge will be built, and I ask unanimous consent to put this statement in the RECORD, for it indicates that this bridge provided under the bill H. R. 437, introduced by my friend the gentleman from Ohio, which is the next bill on the calendar, had as its original purpose and will have as it will be amended a railroad bridge, and that the money for the building of this bridge is assured if no other bill providing for a bridge at this point, Maysville, Ky., passes this House; and, further, that in accordance with the ideas of my good friend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] in regard to bridge construction, this bridge will be built without there being put on the market any sort of securities which will violate any blue sky law, but the money sufficient to build the bridge will be furnished by the persons entering into this contract, and who are able to do so.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. At that point will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. In just a moment. If this bill, H. R. 472, is not passed, which we now have before us, and the next bill, H. R. 437, is passed, which provides for a railroad bridge, the money can be furnished, the bridge can be built; and we can not get any bridge if we pass both of these bills.

I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BRAND of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I do not feel like yielding further.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I certainly trust the gentleman will permit an answer to the statement of his colleague.

Mr. BRAND of Ohio. I yield for a short statement.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I state that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD] did not quote me correctly in stating I said it was a bluff. I said they had sketches that could be viewed by the public showing that the bridge contemplated was a two-bridged affair; that they had made public statements in the press that the railroad end of the bridge would await a railroad constructed to it; and I submitted to the gentleman, as I recall it, that any railroad proposition was standing on mighty flimsy foundation that would not be constructed to serve as a common carrier unless they could not get the vehicular privileges attendant upon a combination bridge across the Ohio River. I still take that position. The Lord knows I would not lift my hand or lift my voice to put an obstacle in the way of moving Kentucky coal, because I know the condition in the Kentucky coal field. Our trouble has been, and is, that certain sections of Ohio have not wanted us to move our coal. However, there is no trouble about our getting Kentucky coal to Ohio and the lake cargo market on the road already built to carry this coal. It is a far cry—relief for our coal industry by constructing a vehicular bridge and wishing for a railroad to tack on to it—87 miles of railroad at that.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. We are agreed in our aim to do nothing to injure the coal industry of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to insert the affidavit to which I have referred in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned, a notary public in and for the District of Columbia, J. M. Wilson, who, after being duly sworn, says that the following extracts taken from the contract entered into by and between Edward Ball, of Jacksonville, Fla., and Wilmington, Del., the said Edward Ball being the brother-in-law of Alfred I. du Pont, of the same cities, and the said Alfred I. du Pont in reality being the principal in this transaction:

"Whereas bills have been introduced in both Houses of Congress authorizing said company, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a combined railroad and vehicle bridge and approaches thereto across the Ohio River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation between Maysville, Ky., and Aberdeen, Ohio; and

"Whereas parties of the first part are desirous of financing the building of such bridge; and

"Whereas parties of the second part are connected and associated with Alfred I. du Pont interest and may thereby be in a position to finance such construction; and

"Whereas by resolution duly adopted by all of the stockholders of said corporation, a copy of which is hereto attached, said company, for good and valuable considerations therein stated, has contracted with parties of the first part to give said parties of the first part, their successors and assigns, a right within 10 years to lease the railroad facilities and approaches of said bridge for a term of 99 years unless sooner terminated as in the contract provided, and for the further term of 99 years and forever thereafter upon like terms and conditions."

That the entire cost of the said structure including the engineering plans and real estate upon which said bridge and its approaches are located are to be capitalized in the senior securities of the said company, all of which it is agreed shall be taken and the money furnished by said Alfred I. du Pont interest.

That no stock has been sold or offered to the public to aid in the financing of the said bridge and its approaches, excepting that taken by the original organizers and promoters of said The Maysville Bridge Co.

Other conditions existing in said contract are as follows:

"PARAGRAPH 1, SECTION (a). That Congress during its present session will authorize said company to build such bridge and will not during such session authorize the building of any other bridge across the Ohio River at or in the vicinity of Maysville.

"PAR. 2. The party of the second part agrees that within 90 days after the passage of such act, authorizing said company to construct such bridge, and in the absence of any act authorizing any other bridge over the Ohio River at Maysville, or within 10 miles of Maysville."

Signed and acknowledged in the presence of Fred R. Miller, a notary public in and for the District of Columbia this 4th day of February, 1928.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Upon examination of the affidavit of Mr. Wilson submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ROY T. FITZGERALD], it is apparent that the stunt of "now you see it and now you do not see it" is again utilized by Mr. Wilson in an endeavor to maintain his position that the railroad proposition is financed and the construction of the combined bridge certain.

It is well that the affidavit sets forth that it contains "extracts," for the reason that it is difficult indeed to ascertain what it means. Apparently, it is a contract entered into between a gentleman by the name of Edward Ball and the Maysville Bridge Co. It is suggested that Mr. Ball has some connection with the Alfred I. du Pont interests "and may thereby be in position to finance such construction."

But, Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I direct your attention to the absence of any portion of the contract which squints at an agreement to finance or to build a combination bridge at this point. One section of the "extracts" purports to show that Mr. Ball has the option to lease "the railroad facilities and approaches of said bridge" within 10 years, presumably dating from the completion of the bridge. As hereafter set forth, it is unequivocally stated that the railroad portion of the bridge will not be constructed until a railroad may be had to use it. In fact, it would be economic folly to construct a complete railroad bridge unless the railroad which it would serve were financed and constructed. In our construction of this "extract," we define "the railroad facilities" to which reference is made as being the enlarged piers and the enlarged truss contemplated to be constructed and used in the vehicular bridge until they might be needed for the railroad.

That section of the affidavit which states that the cost of the structure shall be capitalized in the senior securities of the Maysville Bridge Co., to be taken over by the du Pont interests, is not a quotation from the contract nor does it refer to the construction of a railroad bridge or a combination railroad and vehicular bridge. It is strange that only such "extracts" are contained in the affidavit as throw no light upon the essential points involved; that is, the fact that a financing arrangement has been agreed upon, together with the type of bridge to be constructed. Truly, it is significant that there is no word in this affidavit indicative of the financing of the railroad which would make the combined bridge of any interest to that territory.

There are some splendid gentlemen living in Maysville who are financially interested in the Maysville Bridge Co. proposition. When I say that they are gentlemen I mean all that the words "Kentucky gentlemen" can imply. They have told me of the arrangement with Mr. Ball; they have printed their position in the press of Maysville, and I state that it is not proposed by them to construct a complete combination railroad and vehicular bridge unless and until they are able to finance a railroad to join that bridge.

At the last session there was not the slightest doubt in my mind that the proposal for a railroad there was a vision without financial support, but even then I did not choose to assume to be the final judge. There was no disturbance of any kind when the two bills passed the House. It was under unanimous-consent agreement. When the bills went to the Senate, I journeyed many times to the other end of the Capitol in the effort to get both bills through so they could become law.

Since the last session and in the late fall, in the persons of some gentlemen in Kentucky, the bill secured some added backing. When I introduced the bill last session I had never heard of Mr. Wilson or the combination bridge feature which cause he espoused. When I reintroduced this bill, H. R. 472, at this session I had received no information that there was any change in the status of the Wilson dream.

I do not hesitate to state that the Wilson proposition had more substance in it at the beginning of this session than it had last session, in my mind, but from what has been said by the president of the company himself I can not permit it to go uncontradicted, even though stated by a Member of the House, that railroads would be carrying coal across the Ohio River at this point.

In the first place, there is no connecting railroad on the Ohio side. It is proposed that in some way or other there will be 87 miles of road constructed to Dayton, Ohio, the home of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ROY T. FITZGERALD]. In this day of discontinuance of railroads, several hundred miles having been abandoned the past few years—15 or 20 miles between Ripley and Georgetown, Ohio, in the Ohio territory proposed to be served by the phantom route—no proponent of this measure but would agree that the financing of that railroad would be quite a problem. It is not stated that the railroad has been financed. Mr. Horace J. Cochran is president of the Maysville Bridge Co. There is no higher-type gentleman in Kentucky than he. He makes no effort to deceive. It is not his nature. In an advertisement which comes out in the local press at Maysville this statement is carried over the signature of the Maysville Bridge Co.:

> We do not propose to complete the railway part of this combination bridge at once. We will complete the vehicular traffic and foot passage parts, and will construct the bridge so as to sustain the weight of a standard railway when it is laid.

Sketches of the proposed bridge show that the vehicular bridge is one thing and the railroad bridge another. As I understand it, it is proposed to make the center piers stronger, so that it will bear the weight of the railroad bridge when it shall be constructed; and, as I understand it, it is contemplated to make the truss which rests on this center pier larger and stronger to the same end; but it is not proposed to build the railroad part of this bridge unless and until a railroad be constructed to it. It is absurd to say that the permit for a vehicular bridge will prevent the construction of a railroad.

I want to make this statement so that my position may be made clear. I have never opposed the Maysville Bridge Co. bill. I am not opposing it now. I am dealing with it as a vehicular bridge with the possibility of it blossoming into a combination bridge. It is certainly strange that an ordinary vehicular bridge bill found its way into the hopper at the last session. Then, it was claimed, that "any kind of a bridge can be built under that bill." At this session, the usual form for a combination bridge bill was not used and when it comes upon the floor to-day it is an ordinary vehicular bridge bill.

The statement from the Maysville Bridge Co. itself is unequivocal in its language that the railroad feature awaits the railroad. Here is my position: I am favoring the passage of the Maysville Bridge Co. bill. I have never opposed it. At the same time I have been endeavoring to follow the general policy laid down by Congress that no bona fide offer to build a bridge that will be of service to a great community will be rejected to the end that monopolies or exclusive privileges will be granted any individual or any corporation. The Maysville people and that vicinity deserve a bridge at that point, and if the adherents of the Maysville Bridge Co. will show me in the contract to which reference has been made and extracts printed therefrom, that the du Pont interests have agreed to finance and construct a complete combination bridge and approaches suitable for a railroad at this point, upon which trains can run, I will not only be glad to assist in the passage of H. R. 437, the Maysville Bridge Co. bill, as I am willing to do now, but I will withdraw my bill from consideration.

However, if they do not choose to give me the assurance that the complete railroad bridge and its approaches are to be constructed in fact rather than be sketched on paper—to await the financing of a railroad 87 miles long, I feel my position is thoroughly justified in my desire to see both bills pass the Congress.

I sincerely trust that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BRAND] will not object to the present consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BRAND of Ohio. I object.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 437) granting the consent of Congress to the Maysville Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. LYON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will withhold his objection a moment.

Mr. LYON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. This bill has been referred to by its sponsors as a combination bridge bill. It has been stated that it is the purpose to construct a railroad and vehicular bridge under the permit herein sought. However, this bill has no combination bridge features in it. As it reads this moment it is an ordinary vehicular bridge bill. In this respect it is identic with the bill for a permit which I introduced, to which objection has just been heard. I understand it is the intention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] to amend the bill in such manner as that a combination bridge bill will be created.

Mr. DENISON. Let me say that we have a different form for a combination bridge and railway bridge. This bill was amended by the committee, but by oversight we failed to make that provision. It was the committee's intention to offer a proper amendment to cure the error mentioned and make it a combination railroad and highway bridge.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I respectfully submit that the language contained in the original bill introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS], though it contained the language "a combined railroad and vehicular bridge," does not meet the requirements of your committee relative to bills to secure permit for the construction of a combined railroad and vehicular bridge.

I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] to the recapture clause of the bill under discussion.

Section 4 of this bill does not provide in terms for the recapture of the bridge. That portion of section 4 to which I refer reads as follows:

SEC. 4. After the completion of such bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War, either the State of Kentucky, the State of Ohio, any public agency or political subdivision of either of such States, within or adjoining which any part of such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all right, title, and interest in real property necessary therefor, by purchase or by condemnation, or expropriation, in accordance with the laws of either of such States governing the acquisition or expropriation.

It is apparent from the reading of this language that there is no right of recapture of the bridge and the approaches that is carried in bills of this character. I submit that the words "such bridge and its approaches and any interest in" should be inserted after the word "in," which is found in line 7, page 7, of H. R. 437.

If the bill is to pass, I submit that it should carefully safeguard the right of recapture afforded to the people under the general policy laid down by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON]. As I stated in my reservation, I do not oppose the bill under consideration and I trust there will be no objection to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LYON. I object.

CONSTRUCTION AT FORT LEAVENWORTH, KANS.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9567) to authorize appropriations for construction at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, is there anyone here from the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I had some discussion with my colleague from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] about this bill, and perhaps I can answer any question that is suggested.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I shall object for the present.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to reserve his objection. My colleague from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] had to return to the hospital, and he asked me to answer any questions that I could.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is a matter of policy. This authorizes an appropriation of $120,000. It is the first time that it is on the Consent Calendar, and I think I shall object.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have an amendment that I think might meet the view of the gentleman from New York. The gentleman will note that the bill was introduced by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], and because of illness he is not able to be here. The form in which it is presented is almost an appropriation. I have an amendment which Mr. JAMES says is agreeable to him, which will limit the authorization to $120,000 by inserting the words "not more than" and by striking out the items, so that all of it would have to be examined by the Budget and be approved and come through in the regular way.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What does the gentleman say about the words "as in the judgment of the Secretary of War"?

Mr. CRAMTON. I have proposed to strike them out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. With the understanding that these amendments will be offered, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $120,000, to be expended for the construction and installation at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., of technical buildings and such utilities and appurtenances thereto as, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, may be necessary, as follows: One hangar, $40,000; field warehouse and shop, $45,000; headquarters building, $20,000; gasoline and oil storage, $5,000; night-flying lighting system, $10,000.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: Page 1, line 5, before the figures "$120,000," insert the words "not more than"; and on page 1, line 10, after the word "thereto," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONVENTION OF UNITED SPANISH WAR VETERANS IN HABANA, CUBA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7908) to authorize the granting of leave to ex-service men and women to attend the annual convention of the United Spanish War Veterans and auxiliary in Habana, Cuba, in 1928.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to object to this type of bills, but there must be some consideration shown to the Treasury and to the Government's interests. The only precedent for this bill was similar action with reference to the Legion meeting in Paris. That is an entirely different situation, however. The distance and all is much greater in that case. No more time and expense are involved in going to Habana than in going to Houston, Tex., or to San Francisco. I do not believe that the precedent established in the Paris convention ought to be extended further. To grant leave of 60 days may result in a good deal of embarrassment to the public business. I therefore feel that it is my duty to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not object to this bill, for this reason: The year 1928 is the thirtieth anniversary of the Spanish-American War, so far as it had to do with us. Not very many veterans of that war desire to go to Cuba to take part in the encampment, which probably will not be duplicated until some other anniversary, perhaps the fiftieth anniversary; and with the precedent established in regard to the American Legion it seems to me to be rather a direct step contrary to the feelings of the veterans of the Spanish War to have an objection raised and an apparent exception made.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is my understanding that the veterans can accumulate time. The bill says:

This statute shall not be construed to modify the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1893, the act approved May 23, 1908, and the act approved February 28, 1925, limiting the annual leave which may be granted with pay to 15 or 30 days in any one year, except that any portion of the 15 or 30 days' leave not granted or used during the calendar year 1927, or the fiscal year 1928, may be allowed to accumulate and be pyramided for the purpose herein specified in addition to the 15 or 30 days' leave with pay in the calendar year 1928 or the fiscal year 1929.

Mr. LEAVITT. Of course, this bill was introduced in 1927, and the fiscal year 1927 has gone by.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I understand the purpose of this bill is to permit men to accumulate their leave for the purpose of allowing them to go to Cuba.

Mr. CRAMTON. The way the laws reads, then, is that a man in the Government service now is entitled to 30 days, and under this bill he is entitled to 60 days. He has no accumulated leave from the past.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But suppose it is 1929?

Mr. CRAMTON. By this provision you are mortgaging his future leave. Thirty days' leave ought to be sufficient even to get from Montana to Cuba and return, and to spend about all the money the boys will have to spend for the trip.

Mr. LEAVITT. Of course, a visit of this kind has a great deal of sentimental value to those who took part in the war. It has no particular meaning to those who did not take part in the war.

Mr. CRAMTON. How long does the meeting take after they get there?

Mr. LEAVITT. Perhaps a week.

Mr. CRAMTON. Of course, in going to Paris and return a month would be of no value, but I do not see that that is in question here. While this is a type of bill that I do not like to object to, yet——

Mr. LEAVITT. I do not think it will apply to more than 30 or 40 men in the Government service.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will ask the gentleman if it is his construction—the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] introduced the bill—that it would be entirely discretionary with the officials as to whether they would grant the leave or not? Because when you are giving a man 60 days' leave with pay, nobody knows whether he will be in the Government service next year, due to resignation or death, and it can not be foreseen whether he would be entitled to anticipated leave. If I could see that it was necessary in order to make the convention a success, that would be one thing; but to give them 60 days' leave with pay when it is not necessary to make the convention a success is another matter.

Mr. LEAVITT. The responsibility is upon any officer in charge of a bureau to say if it will interfere with the public business.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is stated in the bill on line 6 that it is in the discretion of the head of a department or bureau.

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes; that is stated in the bill, and it is understood by the veterans.

Mr. CRAMTON. The bill may come up two weeks from now, and will then require three objections. I object now. If no one agrees with me next time it will pass.

Mr. MADDEN. I agree with the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard. The Clerk will call the next bill.

GRAZING LANDS IN MONTANA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 445) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to enter into a cooperative agreement or agreements with the State of Montana and private owners of land within the State of Montana for grazing and range development, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to enter into a cooperative agreement or agreements with the State of Montana and private owners of such lands in townships 4 north of ranges 50 and 51 east; 5 north of ranges 45, 50, and 51 east; and 6 north of ranges 49, 50, and 51 east, Montana principal meridian, as lie between Mizpah and Pumpkin Creeks, in the State of Montana, whereby such lands and lands within the same area belonging to the United States may be jointly leased for a period of not to exceed 10 years to stockmen owning lands within or adjacent to the said area, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe: and to enter into such an agreement and issue such a lease to a regularly organized association of such stockmen as will fulfill the purposes of this act: Provided, That the lands of the United States within the said area shall be withdrawn from all forms of homestead entry during the period of said lease but shall remain subject to the mineral land laws of the United States: And provided further, That any lease issued under the provisions of this act shall be for grazing and range development purposes only: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to cooperate with any department of the Government in carrying out the purposes of this act with a view to securing the fullest possible benefit to the Government and the livestock industry of such studies as may be made of the operation and results of said cooperative agreements and leases.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important bill and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in regard to it at this point.

Mr. Speaker, this is an important bill and one which should have some explanation in the RECORD because of the principles involved. It is intended to apply to rough grazing lands in Montana, of which the United States owns 27,534 acres so intermingled with the rest that the use of the entire area by local stockmen dependent upon this range is greatly hampered, and the value of the entire area therefore seriously reduced. Authority exists for the leasing of lands privately owned and belonging to the State to these dependent stockmen, but there is no law under which the United States can lease its part of the lands (about one-fourth). The result is that the use of the entire area is made haphazard and destructive to the forage and to the permanent carrying capacity of the range. This bill is intended to allow the Secretary of the Interior to join in such a lease.

The result will be that stockmen having ranches and hay lands on the two creeks between which these grazing lands lie, known as Mizpah and Pumpkin Creeks, may acquire a lease of long enough duration to justify development of water and such range control as will restore and increase carrying capacity. It will thus become an asset to the permanent development of numerous homes and a factor in the building up of a valuable and important industry.

An added value lies in the fact that this area is only a short distance from the range livestock experiment station at old Fork Keogh, near Miles City. Trained men employed there can carry on studies of this area and compile data of the utmost value as to methods of grazing and handling the public ranges.

The entire matter has been worked out in cooperation. The rights of the private owners are not infringed on in any way and no one is forced into any agreement. The bill is only intended to empower the Secretary of the Interior as the agent of the Government to act with other landowers within the area in working out a cooperative agreement whereby these lands may be both used to advantage and adequately protected against overgrazing.

To do this on this area, where the conditions are typically those existing in many western localities, will furnish a laboratory where the vexing problem of how the public ranges should be handled may be, at least, partly worked out. At any rate, there will be opportunity for study, and for that reason the powers granted the Secretary of the Interior are made broad enough for experimental procedure, always in cooperation with the stockmen and the owners of land other than the Government.

To understand fully the constructive possibilities of this bill, it must be remembered that the cooperative unit includes a gross area of 108,804 acres, made up of the following ownerships in total area and per cent of area:

Ownership	Total acres	Per cent of total area
Northern Pacific Railway Co.	44,357	40.8
Privately owned and 90 per cent abandoned	22,432	20.6
Privately owned by cooperators	8,081	7.4
State of Montana	6,400	5.9
Government public domain	27,534	25.3

The unappropriated Government public domain is generally the more broken and poorer forage-producing sections that have not warranted private ownership, and that under present conditions would not justify the payment of taxes and holding charges due to the relatively low production of forage, the only commercial crop upon them. None of this public land is suitable for cultivation. Many of the Northern Pacific sections are similar in character, and the relatively large holdings of the Northern Pacific Railway Co. is indicative of the lack of demand for this land, although it has been for sale by that company for many years. Only in large blocks is this character of land of material value to the stock industry, and consequently the investment and holding charges must be within that amount that will allow the investor a reasonable return from his livestock products.

The first use made of this locality for livestock production followed the migration of the southern herds to the virgin grasslands of Montana in the early eighties. At that time this range in common with others in this section of Montana was composed mainly of the wheat grasses, Agropyron Smithii and Agropyrum Spicatum, highly palatable to cattle and producing a considerable volume of forage due to the height growth of the species. The less volume-producing grammas and other drought-resistant grasses were present but in restricted amounts. Pioneers yet recall the days of the virgin range, when the grasses touched the stirrups and prairie hay was available wherever sufficiently level to cut. This condition was undoubtedly true, the wheat grasses were preeminent and had not given way through overstocking and abuse to the more resistant, the less volume-producing gramma, and associated species.

This area was in these early days used largely for winter range. The broken topography supplied the shelter and a protected summer growth of forage furnished sufficient winter pasture. Adjoining valleys were unfenced and available for summer range, allowing the broken hills to grow and retain the grasses for winter use. Progressing settlement of the valleys gradually forced the use of these hills for summer pasture in addition to the winter use, until finally the hills represented the only remaining free and unrestricted range, and competition between stockmen had arrived at that point where the numbers of stock were in excess of the available forage and severe overgrazing resulted in the practical disappearance of the highly palatable and greater-volume-producing wheat grasses and a change in the composition of the forage plants to a predominating short gramma-grass range with associated less palatable species. This condition of overstocking caused certain stockmen to attempt to secure private control of certain portions of the range by entering into contract purchases for the alternate sections of Northern Pacific lands with the hope of controlling the alternate Government sections, and providing pasture that could be controlled and protected insufficient area to provide pasture for their herds. Then came the 640-acre grazing homestead act and the land boom, and these stockmen found themselves facing the necessity of purchasing the alternate Government sections that were indiscriminately filed upon as rapidly as title could be secured. This was followed by the deflation period, mounting taxes, increased holding charges, and low prices for livestock products, with the result that the contract-purchased lands were largely thrown back upon the railroad company and other lands taken over by creditors in liquidation of loans. Improvements depreciated, abandoned and worthless horses became numerous, and the overgrazed condition of the land reduced the production of cattle from the above area from an estimate of 6,000 head, some 30 years ago, to a maximum of 2,300 head this year.

It was this condition that aroused the interest of the remaining settlers and resulted in the forming of a cooperative livestock association with the common hope and object of legitimately, and at a price within the realization of a safe return from a livestock investment, to acquire control of this unit of range land upon which their ranches and farms are dependent.

Representative sections of the uncontrolled range were covered by an intensive grazing survey and as a check the William Tonn pasture that lies within the unit and that has been under control since 1919 was also intensively surveyed. This survey took into consideration the density, composition, palatability, and volume of the plant growth on both the unrestricted and the controlled range. The controlled range is exactly similar to the uncontrolled except that it has been properly stocked for the past six years, is under fence, and has had water developed at reasonable distances for the stock.

The Tonn pasture averages 168 forage acres per section, and the uncontrolled area 107 forage acres per section, or in terms of carrying capacity for cattle over a six and one-half months period, the Tonn pasture averages 16 surface acres per head as to 22 surface acres per head for the outside uncontrolled range.

The Tonn pasture shows 7 per cent more density, 19 per cent more volume, and 12 per cent more palatability than the outside range. The total production of forage within the Tonn pasture is 38 per cent more than the average for the uncontrolled range. In other words, if we assume that the uncontrolled range is producing 100 tons of forage for a given area, the Tonn pasture, through proper use and control, is producing 138 tons of forage from an equal area.

The gross area of the proposed grazing unit is 108,804 acres. Under present conditions this represents 18,134 forage acres, which, based upon actual carrying capacity experiments on the Custer National Forest, represents an animal month carrying capacity of 20,160, or in terms of livestock, 2,520 cattle for an 8-month period. This 2,520 cattle represents the true carrying capacity of the uncontrolled unit under present conditions. Assuming that an equal control management and water development as now existent in the Tonn pasture may be exercised, the area should support within six years an increase of 38 per cent in livestock, represented by 25,025 forage acres, 27,821 animal months, or 3,477 head of cattle for an 8-month period. This indicates a possible increase of 957 cattle within a six-year period from increased production of forage through intelligent control, management, and improvements.

The survey indicated that the Tonn pasture has not yet reached the maximum forage production that may be expected from a longer period of control, proper management, and stocking. The wheat grasses are increasing rapidly and conservative estimates would indicate that an additional increase in carrying capacity may be expected. It is not too optimistic to forecast that 10 years of proper management and control of the proposed unit would permanently allow 4,000 cattle to graze where only 2,500 find sufficient forage to-day.

The stockmen take the attitude that they can not afford to develop water or make any range improvements without a reasonable assurance that they may be protected in their use. Too often they have seen migratory stockmen move in on the water holes that control the adjoining range, and under present conditions they have no authority to prevent such encroachment. They are so dependent upon summer pasture that the present situation tends to prevent any material investment in improvements on their owned lands, since loss of the summer pasture would depreciate and make practically valueless the home ranches where the winter feed is produced. Their present hope is that by some form of assurance of permanent use of the necessary summer pasture they may confidently face the future, build up their private investments in ranch property, create a future for their children, and place their business upon as equally a sound plane as any other business or profession.

It is interesting to know that the Montana Stockgrowers' Association and the Eastern Montana Wool Growers' Association both passed resolutions favorable to enactment. They, like most stockmen of the West, are studying the problem of management of the public ranges with the hope that they may be made to fit into the need of permanent use. The Montana Agricultural College and its extension service, the Forest Service, and the officials and experts of the Range Livestock Experiment Station, close at hand, are lending every cooperative assistance possible.

The bill makes it possible for all concerned to reach the common ground necessary to constructive and helpful results of both immediate benefit and the broad value and possibility of thereby arriving at a wise national policy.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5603) to authorize members of the Civil Service Commission and its duly authorized representatives to administer oaths of office.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That members of the Civil Service Commission and its duly authorized representatives are hereby empowered and authorized to administer oaths of office, without compensation, to prospective officers and employees in the civil service of the United States, required to be taken upon their appointment or change of status.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENCAMPMENT OF THE UNITED CONFEDERATE VETERANS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7013) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to lend to the Governor of Arkansas 5,000 canvas cots, 10,000 blankets, 10,000 bed sheets, 5,000 pillows, 5,000 pillowcases, and 5,000 mattresses or bed sacks to be used at the encampment of the United Confederate Veterans to be held at Little Rock, Ark., in May, 1928.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 9, after the word "committee," insert the following: "Mr. E. R. Wiles: Provided further, That the Secretary of War before delivering said property shall take from said E. R. Wiles a good and sufficient bond for the safe return of said property in good order and condition and the whole without expense to the United States."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

UNAUTHORIZED WEARING, MANUFACTURE, OR SALE OF MEDALS AND BADGES AWARDED BY THE WAR DEPARTMENT

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8309) to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit the unauthorized wearing, manufacture, or sale of medals and badges awarded by the War Department," approved February 24, 1923.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to prohibit the unauthorized wearing, manufacture, or sale of medals and badges awarded by the War Department," approved February 24, 1923, be amended so as to read as follows:

"Any person who offends against the provisions of this section shall, on conviction, be punished by a fine not exceeding $250 or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: On page 1, line 5, after the figures "1923," insert the following: "section 1425 of Title X, United States Code."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CAPITOL BUILDING AND GROUNDS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 391) to regulate the use of the Capitol Building and Grounds.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

BRIDGE BILLS

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, there are a number of bridge bills on the calendar that were not reached a while ago, and to which I know there is no objection. If there is no objection from Members of the House, I would like to call up those bills and pass them en bloc, as we did a while ago, in order to save time and to accommodate Members who have introduced bills which require immediate action.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I want to reserve the right to object to two of those bills, in order that I may ask some questions of the author of the bills.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bills, Calendar Nos. 231, 232, 235, 236, 242, 243, 244, 251, 253, 254, 267, and 268, be considered as having been read, the committee amendments agreed to, and the bills engrossed, read a third time, and passed. I am not making a motion to reconsider to-day.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what does the gentleman propose to do with the other bills?

Mr. DENISON. I have omitted those bills to which I shall have to offer amendments from the floor, and those bills include the bills in which the gentleman from Tennessee is interested.

Mr. BYRNS. Does the gentleman propose to pass them right away?

Mr. DENISON. I am going to make that request.

The SPEAKER. Do the bills referred to by the gentleman from Illinois include the two bills to which the gentleman from Ohio desires to reserve the right to object?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes. I desire to reserve the right to object in order to ask some questions of the author of the bills H. R. 473 and H. R. 5722.

Mr. DENISON. I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose now.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman from Kentucky seems to be the author of these two bills, H. R. 473 and H. R. 5722. I notice that these bills provide for the construction of bridges at the same place. While I appreciate that it is the policy of Congress not to refuse bridge permits just because it might work a hardship on the investment already made in some nearby bridge project, still I know that Congress will not allow a permit if it is not asked for in good faith. I would therefore like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether or not these bridge bills are introduced in good faith, or whether there is any question about one of them or the other?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I know the high purpose which actuates the gentleman from Ohio. I will say frankly that, if I were not thoroughly convinced that each of them was in good faith, and the offers made by responsible people, I would not have introduced the two bills. I will say to the gentleman that, as he knows, Ashland, Ky., is a city of some 32,000 people and is the only city of its size on the Ohio River which has no bridge across the river.

I have documentary evidence in my hands indicating the financial strength of each of the parties who desire permits. I am thoroughly satisfied they are good-faith offers and that the jobs can be done.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman will appreciate that Coal Grove, Ohio, and South Point, in my district, are opposite Ashland, and that naturally the people in that section are interested. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky what he has to say with reference to the financial standing of the Ashland Bridge Co., and the probability of this company carrying out the agreement it has with the council of the village of Coal Grove to commence work within 90 days after the final approval of the plans by the War Department?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I have communications from officials of the three banks in Ashland, Ky.—Mr. John E. Buckingham, president of the Ashland National Bank; Mr. L. N. Davis, cashier and vice president of the Second National Bank; and Mr. L. E. Davies, cashier of the Third National Bank—who vouch for their good faith and their financial worth. They say to me in these communications they have no doubt but this bridge will be started within 90 days after the permit is secured and the War Department approves their plans. They state unequivocally that the Ashland Bridge Co. is financially able to do the job. I may say with regard to the Rogers Bros. Co., that the Rogers brothers themselves are men of considerable means. The information I have is that they are thoroughly able, financially and otherwise, to do the job.

Mr. JENKINS. It has come to my attention that there are reports about to the effect that one of these concerns is a stock-promoting scheme. What has the gentleman to say about that?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I have looked into that, and I have a letter from the city solicitor of Ashland, John T. Diederich, and he informs me that there is not one cent of promotion stock involved in the Ashland Bridge Co. proposition. In respect of the Rogers Bros. position, I am assured by a gentleman who formerly represented my district in this House and late Governor of Kentucky, Hon. W. J. Field, that there is no inflated promotion scheme of any kind connected with their offer.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, upon this assurance that my constituents in this vicinity of Coal Grove and South Point, Ohio, are not to be imposed upon by any promotion schemes, and that these proposals are in good faith, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The following bridge bills were severally considered, the committee amendments agreed to, the bills as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, were read the third time, and passed:

H. R. 9064. A bill granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of the State of Alabama to construct a bridge across the Coosa River near Pell City, on the Pell City-Anniston road, between Calhoun and St. Clair Counties, Ala.;

H. R. 9186. A bill granting the consent of Congress to the Sistersville Ohio River Bridge Co., a corporation, its successors and assigns, for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a toll bridge across the Ohio River at Sistersville, Tyler County, W. Va.;

H. R. 9339. A bill granting the consent of Congress to the Board of County Commissioners of Trumbull County, Ohio, to construct a free highway bridge across the Mahoning River at Warren, Trumbull County, Ohio;

H. R. 9484. A bill granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of the State of Alabama to construct a bridge across the Tombigbee River near Aliceville on the Gainesville-Aliceville road in Pickens County, Ala.;

H. R. 8926. A bill granting the consent of Congress to the State Highway Commission of Arkansas to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Red River near Garland, Ark.;

H. R. 9019. A bill granting the consent of Congress to the State Highway Commission of Arkansas to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ouachita River near Calion, Ark.;

H. R. 9063. A bill to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Chattahoochee River at or near Alaga, Ala.;

H. R. 9280. A bill authorizing the extension of time for the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River approximately midway between the city of Owensboro, Ky., and Rockport, Ind.;

H. R. 9660. A bill authorizing the city of Louisville, Ky., to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Ohio River at or near said city;

H. R. 9849. A bill granting the consent of Congress for the extension of the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Quincy, Ill.;

H. R. 473. A bill granting the consent of Congress to the Ashland Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River; and

H. R. 5722. A bill granting the consent of Congress to the Rogers Bros. Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at Ashland, Ky.

CAPITOL BUILDING AND GROUNDS

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 205 (H. R. 391), a bill to regulate the use of the Capitol Building and Grounds and that I may withdraw the objection which I made a few moments ago.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration to the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, unless authorized by concurrent resolution of Congress, the Capitol Building or Grounds shall not, except as provided in section 2, be used as a place to (1) parade, (2) deliver or make any address, oration, or speech, (3) hold or conduct any concert, reception, funeral, pageant, ceremony, celebration, exercise, or service of any kind, or (4) erect to display any flag banner, emblem, or device, designed or adapted to bring into public notice any party, organization, or movement.

The provisions of this section shall not apply to the use of the Capitol Building or Grounds as a place to transact any public business relating to the Congress or either House thereof or the Supreme Court of the United States.

SEC. 2. The Architect of the Capitol is authorized to permit, under rules and regulations to be promulgated by him, and under his supervision and direction: (1) The holding of dedicatory and memorial services in the Capitol Building or on the Capitol Grounds in connection with any statue, bust, or painting which has lawfully been placed in such building or upon the grounds, (2) the holding of concerts on the Capitol Grounds by any band in the service of the United States, and (3) in the event Congress is not in session, the use of the rotunda of the Capitol Building for funerals of distinguished public officials.

SEC. 3. Section 5 of the act entitled "An act to regulate the use of the Capitol Grounds," approved July 1, 1882, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That it is forbidden to discharge any firearm, firework, or explosive, set fire to any combustible, or utter loud, threatening, or abusive language."

SEC. 4. Sections 6, 10, and 11 of said act, as amended, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. So much of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1900, as reads: "Provided, That nothing in the act to regulate the use of the Capitol Grounds, approved July 1, 1882, shall be construed to prohibit concerts on the Capitol Grounds at times when neither House of Congress is sitting by any band in the service of the United States under the direction of the Architect of the Capitol," is hereby repealed.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, line 15, after the word "officials" insert "or distinguished ex-public officials."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill, or some one who can give me information concerning it, one or two questions. I suppose the third paragraph in section 2 is new law, and I presume the Architect of the Capitol is to determine the question in the case of funerals held while Congress is not in session. The matter seems to be left wholly in the discretion of the Architect of the Capitol.

Mr. LANHAM. The Architect of the Capitol stated before the committee that in such matters he always acts in cooperation with the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, and would do so even with the enactment of this legislation. It was considered advisable to have some one directly responsible and in charge, with the understanding, however, he would act in cooperation with the Sergeants-at-Arms of the respective bodies.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Texas will observe that it is proposed to amend the bill and to insert "or distinguished ex-officials." I think this act if adopted means that the Architect of the Capitol will be the official who will determine whether or not the Capitol Building or any part of it shall be used for funerals of ex-public officials.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Distinguished ex-public officials?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. I think it is clear that is true.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ISOLATED TRACTS OF PUBLIC LANDS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6684) to amend section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended, relating to isolated tracts of public land.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill requires three objections. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2455. It shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Interior to order into market and sell at public auction, at the land office of the district in which the land is situated, for not less than $1.25 an acre, any isolated or disconnected tract or parcel of the public domain not exceeding 320 acres which, in his judgment, it would be proper to expose for sale after at least 30 days' notice by the land office of the district in which such land may be situated: Provided, That any legal subdivisions of the public land, not exceeding 160 acres, the greater part of which is mountainous or too rough for cultivation, may, in the discretion of the said Secretary, be ordered into the market and sold pursuant to this act upon the application of any person who owns lands or holds a valid entry of lands adjoining such tract, regardless of the fact that such tract may not be isolated or disconnected within the meaning of this act: Provided further, That this act shall not defeat any vested right which has already attached under any pending entry or location."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 14, strike out the word "vested" and insert in lieu thereof the word "valid."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment:

On page 1, line 4, after the word "States" insert in parenthesis "section 1171 of title 43 U. S. C."; and at line 6, after the figures "2455" in parenthesis "section 1171 of title 43, of U. S. C."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: On page 1, in line 4, after the word "States" insert in parenthesis "section 1171, title 43, U. S. C."; and in line 6, after the figures "2455" insert in parenthesis "section 1171, title 43, U. S. C."

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. When this bill was up before and was objected to and the question involved in the gentleman's amendment was raised, I happened to read the bill and to compare it with the section of the code which it seeks to amend. On page 2, line 9, and also at line 13, the word "act" appears. In the section of the code, at both places, the word is "section." I should like to know why this change from "section" to "act," and whether it does not enlarge the scope of this section by changing it from section to act. I do not know whether the author of the bill did this intentionally or whether this is the language in the bill that came from the department. What is the object of changing the word "section" to "act"?

Mr. WINTER. I can not inform the gentleman, but the form of the bill was approved by the Interior Department as it reads now.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I am just wondering whether they are after something more than they are entitled to, or something more than they want or should have.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not think so. The language is "pursuant to this act," and it refers to this bill.

Mr. RAMSEYER. But this is a section of a number of sections of the act; and the original section, which was the law and is the law now, but which will be displaced by this section, always referred to section and not to act; and what is embodied in this section was only intended to affect things in this section and not in the act, which may have consisted of quite a number of sections, as the gentleman well knows.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think there might be that danger if it referred to some other act or some other section. Still, there would not be any objection, if the gentleman wishes, to amend it to read "section" instead of "act."

Mr. RAMSEYER. Then, after we dispose of the pending amendment, I will offer another amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, strike out the word "act" and insert the word "section," and on page 2, line 13, strike out the word "act" in both places and insert the word "section."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

A message in writing from the President of the United States was presented to the House of Representatives, by Mr. Hess, one of his secretaries.

DEBT OWED BY GREECE TO THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

To the Congress of the United States:

I am submitting herewith for your consideration a copy of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury regarding the proposed plan for the settlement of the debt owed by Greece to the United States and of the differences existing between the two Governments arising out of the tripartite loan agreement entered into at Paris under date of February 10, 1918.

The plan of settlement has my approval, and I recommend that the Congress enact the necessary legislation authorizing it for the following reasons:

It provides for the funding of the Greek war debt to our Government and for the settlement of the Greek claim for further advances under the tripartite loan agreement made during the war. While our Government is to advance some twelve millions to Greece, the loan is amply secured, is to be repaid over a period of 20 years at an adequate rate of interest, and is to be used exclusively for reconstruction work of great humanitarian as well as economic value. This loan discharges what the Greek Government has consistently contended is a legal and moral commitment of our Government.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 6, 1928.

INDEBTEDNESS OF THE KINGDOM OF SERBS, CROATS, AND SLOVENES

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, I present the following report on H. R. 367, to authorize the settlement of the indebtedness of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes.

TO CONSOLIDATE COPYRIGHT ACTS

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 6104) to amend sections 57 and 61 of the act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyrights," approved March 4, 1909, with the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 6104, as amended, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 57 and 61 of the act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright," approved March 4, 1909 (sec. 57 and sec. 61, of Title 17, U. S. C.), be, and the same are hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 57. That the said printed current catalogues as they are issued shall be promptly distributed by the copyright office to the collectors of customs of the United States and to the postmasters of all exchange offices of receipt of foreign mails, in accordance with revised lists of such collectors of customs and postmasters prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General, and they shall also be furnished in whole or in part to all parties desiring them at a price to be determined by the register of copyrights for each part of the catalogue not exceeding $10 for the complete yearly catalogue of copyright entries. The consolidated catalogues and indexes shall also be supplied to all persons ordering them at such prices as may be determined to be reasonable, and all subscriptions for the catalogues shall be received by the Superintendent of Public Documents, who shall forward the said publications; and the moneys thus received shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and accounted for under such laws and Treasury regulations as shall be in force at the time.

"SEC. 61. That the register of copyrights shall receive, and the persons to whom the services designated are rendered shall pay, the following fees: For the registration of any work subject to copyright, deposited under the provisions of this act, $2, which sum is to include a certificate of registration under seal: Provided, That in the case of any unpublished work registered under the provisions of section 11, the fee for registration with certificate shall be $1, and in the case of a published photograph the fee shall be $1 where a certificate is not desired. For every additional certificate of registration made, $1. For recording and certifying any instrument of writing for the assignment of copyright, or any such license specified in section 1, subsection (e), or for any copy of such assignment or license, duly certified, $2 for each copyright office record-book page or additional fraction thereof over one-half page. For recording the notice of user or acquiescence specified in section 1, subsection (e), $1 for each notice of not more than five titles. For comparing any copy of an assignment with the record of such document in the copyright office and certifying the same under seal, $2. For recording the renewal of copyright provided for in sections 23 and 24, $1. For recording the transfer of the proprietorship of copyrighted articles, 10 cents for each title of a book or other article, in addition to the fee prescribed for recording the instrument of assignment. For any requested search of copyright office records, indexes, or deposits, $1 for each hour of time consumed in making such search: Provided, That only one registration at one fee shall be required in the case of several volumes of the same book deposited at the same time."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from New York to 20 minutes.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to increase the fees in the copyright office. It does not affect any other part of the law. The fees have not been increased in the copyright office in years. They are running behind, so far as their finances are concerned, and had to go before the Committee on Appropriations at the beginning of this session of Congress to obtain special relief. The number of copyright matters coming before the office is increasing daily, and it is absolutely necessary to increase the fees to anywhere near pay the cost of giving this monopoly to these different people. We have increased the fees for all published work from $1 to $2 and the fee on unpublished works we leave at $1. We have doubled the price of the catalogues because of the cost of printing.

Mr. ABERNETHY. This does not change the law except as to fees?

Mr. VESTAL. No.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Do I understand that an article, for instance, which is copyrighted in the newspaper still pays $1?

Mr. VESTAL. No.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Suppose you write an article to-day for one of the Washington papers, which appears in its columns, and that is the only print there is of it, and you copyright it. Is the fee for that $1 or $2?

Mr. VESTAL. Two dollars.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. What do you mean by "$2"?

Mr. VESTAL. Suppose a man writes a piece of music and it is not published before he gets the copyright on it. Before it is published he pays $1.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. You say this copyright-fee increase is to pay the expenses of the copyright office?

Mr. VESTAL. Partly to pay the expenses.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Heretofore they have been losing money, have they?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BOYLAN. I think, gentlemen, you remember this bill; it is an old customer. It was passed here last year, and while it passed the House, it failed to pass the Senate.

It is a very simple bill. Inasmuch as the question was asked by my colleague from Texas [Mr. GARNER] as to whether or not it increased the fee. I will answer, it does increase the fee 100 per cent. Where the present fee for copyrighting an article is $1, it is increased to $2.

This, gentlemen, is a tax on intelligence, and because the copyright bureau is running behind it wants to get additional money out of the poor writers and poor authors—is manifestly unfair. We do not ask our Agricultural Department to be self-sustaining. We do not ask that the Post Office Department be self-sustaining. We do not ask that our Bureau of Education shall be self-sustaining. We do not ask that our State Department shall be self-sustaining. We do not ask any of the departments that disseminate information to the people of the country, that they be made to pay their way. Why pick on the poor author and make him come and double his contribution to the Government?

Take the case of all the country newspapers. Suppose one of you gentlemen prepared a splendid address—such as I know you are capable of doing—and had it put into the home paper, and before it was sent out you wished to have it copyrighted. You probably felt that it was of such importance that it ought to be handed down to posterity. Instead of paying a dollar you would have to pay $2.

Gentlemen, I think you will agree with me when I say that we ought to seek out the intelligence of the country, we ought to encourage it, and we ought to foster it by every possible means in our power and not try to nip the budding genius in its very inception by adding to the cost of copyright. I do not see why, because men receive an increase of salary in the copyright bureau that the increase of salary should come out of the poor, struggling author rather than out of the other general funds that we have. I believe in an increase of salary, and I believe on the whole that Government officials are poorly paid and woefully underpaid.

I know, gentlemen, that after your arduous labors of the day here many of you, if you have no dinner engagement, retire to the sanctity of your den, after a good dinner, and you get out the old slippers and the dressing robe and the faithful pipe; you go and pick out a favorite author and regale your mind with him for an hour or two. I want you to consider that some of these authors who entertain you and who have shed such luster and renown upon the literature that has come down to us through the years, were poor men. If these men had had to pay the copyright charges proposed by you to-day you would not have the privilege of reading the splendid emanations of their minds.

You may say, "Well, what does a dollar amount to?" Well, of course, a dollar may not amount to much to a man of opulence such as a Congressman and other celebrated public officials, but a dollar would mean a whole lot to a struggling author. It would mean very, very much. That dollar might be just the very thing that would prevent the publication of his work.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the author had not sold his story he would not be required to pay the $2, but would have to pay only $1.

Mr. BOYLAN. Of course, but it would be taken out of his meager stipend.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the dollar were taken out of the price for his story it would not make any difference whether it was copyrighted or not. Can the gentleman mention an author who would be hurt by this bill?

Mr. BOYLAN. I will say that as respects a distinguished author who writes daily and whose writings are copyrighted and are well known to you and other Members of the House, I am credibly informed that all he gets for his daily articles is $10. I know that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is himself an author.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not want to copyright myself.

Mr. BOYLAN. I know you would not accept $2 for your articles, because I know they are of such superior merit that they are worth more than $2. That dollar would come out of the $10. That dollar would buy your breakfast.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He would get $10 from each paper, but he has got only one copyright fee to pay.

Mr. BOYLAN. Oh, no; the gentleman is in error.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BOYLAN. I yield myself three minutes more. The copyright fee would be paid only once. In the case of a syndicated article the gentleman gets only $10 for the whole article.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He must be, indeed, a poor author.

Mr. BOYLAN. He may not, of course, be in the gentleman's class, but he is an author who is highly thought of not only by Members of this House but by newspaper readers in general.

I think, gentlemen of the House, it is our duty to foster struggling authors, and I would be in favor of eliminating entirely all charges for copyrights, because then we would add a further incentive to the genius of the Nation. Of course, they say the first 25 years are the hardest, and I would do that in order to help them over the first 25 years.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is the author the gentleman has in mind the man who writes about the famous water from Indiana?

Mr. BOYLAN. Well, that might be one of his subjects. I do not know that he confines himself exclusively to that. However, gentlemen, I consider we should help these struggling authors because we can not have too much intelligence in America. The more intelligent our people are, the better grasp they will have of the doings and workings of Congress; the better they will be able to read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the better they will be able to read, digest, and analyze the wonderful orations delivered on the floor of the House.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. Does the gentleman believe that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD should be copyrighted?

Mr. BOYLAN. I believe if it were copyrighted it might perhaps retard its circulation. [Laughter.] I believe we should give the greatest measure of intelligence to all our people. I am in favor not only of not increasing the cost of copyrights but, as I said previously, I am in favor of eliminating all charges whatever in order that the industrious men and women of America devoting themselves to literary pursuits might be encouraged in every possible way.

Mr. HOOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. HOOPER. Does not the publisher ordinarily pay the copyright fee when the author has submitted his work to him?

Mr. BOYLAN. Well, I understand that in many instances the publisher pays it, but takes it out of the stipend given the author.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What a piker that publisher must be.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself two additional minutes. In conclusion I ask you to consider this matter very carefully and to vote as your consciences dictate. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM].

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a very brief statement with reference to this bill. I serve on the committee which gave it consideration. It was reported to this House unanimously by that committee. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN] has made the statement that this is a tax upon intelligence. In my judgment, it is very far from that. The copyright laws of this country give an exclusive privilege to authors whose works are copyrighted. This privilege is for a period of 28 years, with the right of renewal for an additional 28 years, making a total of 56 years. The reference which the gentleman from New York made to the Postal Service and other departments of the Government, therefore, is not analogous to this case because the service to which he alludes is not an exclusive privilege. Copyright laws do not put a tax upon intelligence, but, on the contrary, protect intelligence by granting an exclusive right for 56 years.

All we are asking is that those so protected pay a part of the cost of their own protection, in order that the public generally, who pay taxes and who buy these copyrighted works, may not have to contribute unduly from the Treasury of the American people to the opportunity afforded authors to enrich themselves. Now, that is the gist of this matter.

The gentleman has made reference to the authors. All of the leading authors in this country, certainly all those who have any organized voice through which they can speak, are on record before our committee as being heartily in favor of this legislation; and, as a matter of fact, in our hearings there has not been one protest from any source against the enactment of this bill.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman please state, for the benefit of the Members of the House, why the authors and composers did not object to this bill, and say it was on account of the fact that they wanted to raise the salaries of the employees of the department; that the chairman of the Appropriations Committee said the only way you could get it was by raising the fees, and that is the reason why the authors and composers did not object to this?

Mr. LANHAM. I may have to ask for a little more time if I have to answer these questions, because I want to go on with my statement; but let me say this: Suppose they did ask that? Suppose the authors made the request that the fees be increased in order that those who are working in the copyright office might receive salaries commensurate with the work they are doing? Their higher salaries would then be paid by the copyright fees received from the authors themselves, and yet they are asking that an increased fee be placed upon them, so, even on that assumption, the authors are not objecting.

Now, what is the situation as to the authors? It is almost impossible to buy a piece of current literature, of fiction, biography, or history for less than $2 a single copy, and the copyright fee we are asking here is $2, the cost of a single copy of most works of fiction offered the public to-day. For the $2 which the author pays, what do we give him? We give him the exclusive right to all the earnings received from that copyrighted article for 56 years, and for that privilege the author pays the cost of one copy of his book. Is there anything unreasonable in that? If it is a play or if it is some work he wants to use for a particular purpose without going to the expense of having it published, he may copyright it as an unpublished work at the rate of $1, which now obtains. There is no increase in that cost whatever.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I do not know very much about this bill, so I want a little information. As I understand it, all you are asking is to get enough money to reimburse the Government for the work it is doing at the present time.

Mr. LANHAM. To be sure, and it is doubtful whether it will do that.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. LANHAM. The copyright office is now operating at a loss.

Mr. SNELL. And this bill is for the purpose of making up that loss.

Mr. LANHAM. Yes; or at least a part of it.

Mr. SNELL. For the rights you give them in the protection of their work.

Mr. LANHAM. That is exactly it. We are simply asking the man who dances to help pay the fiddler.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. In just a moment, after I have finished this statement. We are asking those who receive this privilege to pay part of the cost of conferring the privilege.

We have been making annual appropriations for the upkeep and maintenance of the copyright office. In order to do what?

In order to give these very people an opportunity to have an exclusive right to their work for 56 years.

As I have said before, there has been no complaint whatever before our committee with reference to the bill.

There is just one other feature of the measure which I wish to discuss. We are increasing from $5 to $10 the price of the annual catalogue. The annual catalogue contains about 8,000 octavo pages listing about 170,000 copyright entries a year.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LANHAM. I will.

Mr. BLOOM. Why not make the price of that book $50, when through the purchase of that book the people who use it make hundreds of thousands of dollars out of it? Why only increase that from $5 to $10 when you double the fee in the other instance?

Mr. LANHAM. The gentleman can apply the argument in the same way to authors. Why, we read in the newspapers and in the magazines about editions of some of these books that are going into 80,000 or 90,000 copies, and the author for his small payment of $2 is getting great returns from his production. Why not on the same principle increase this fee?

We are simply trying here to do what we think is reasonable and equitable for all parties concerned without working a hardship upon anyone, and we are seeking thereby more nearly to defray the actual cost of operation of our copyright office.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. With reference to the cost of this book which we are proposing to sell for $10, does the gentleman know what it costs the department?

Mr. LANHAM. I suppose it costs considerably more than $10 per copy to prepare the book.

Mr. BLOOM. Is it not the fact that this book which is sold to merchants and others throughout the country is something they absolutely require in their business, and is it not true they could not conduct their business without having this book, and they would be willing to pay $100 for the book if you charged them that much for it?

Mr. LANHAM. I will answer the gentleman in this way. If the gentleman can get this bill amended and increase that price of $10 and thereby make them come more nearly paying the cost of operation of our copyright office, I will vote for it.

Mr. BLOOM. So will I. Speak to the chairman of the committee and let us amend it.

Mr. LANHAM. In other words, the committee is endeavoring here to get an increase which, though not commensurate with the protection afforded the beneficiaries, will help us to defray the cost of operating this office. [Applause.]

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I have heard the distinguished gentleman from Texas, whom I respect and admire. Did he emphasize in his argument that he was going to help the publication of beautiful things that might go down through the years—writings that would raise and elevate the minds of mankind—by eliminating the copyright fee? Oh, no; it was the cost that he emphasized. The only argument he had was the cost. Is there any price on superintelligence, is there any rule of thumb whereby you can place a value upon it? Will you allow a mere matter of cost to fail to bring to it a proper state of recognition? We ought to have something else in our minds rather than the cost. We ought to get away occasionally from the dull daily grind and refresh our souls by enjoying the beauties of nature, art, music, and literature. We ought to think about these things and not be everlastingly talking about costs. Let us not be known as a dollar nation. Let us show the world that we have some regard for the finer things in life. We can do this by defeating this bill that increases the burden on the struggling author.

Mr. McSWAIN. Is the gentleman in favor of the $1 fee?

Mr. BOYLAN. I am in favor of eliminating the $1 tax. There should be no tax on intelligence.

Mr. BLOOM. But the gentleman is willing to let the $1 stay?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes; I am in favor of that for the present.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, the following leaves of absence were granted:

To Mr. BACON, for two days, on account of illness.

To Mr. JACOBSTEIN, for an indefinite period, on account of illness in his family.

DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, AND LABOR APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 8269) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

Which was ordered printed.

FREE GOVERNMENT AND FREE PRESS

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address that I delivered before the Texas Press Association.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I avail myself of the privilege granted to me by the House by printing in the RECORD an address delivered by me before the State convention of the Texas Press Association at El Paso, Tex., on June 17, 1927:

Mr. President and members of the Texas Press Association, the honor of addressing the State Press Association of Texas places me greatly in your debt. I desire to make acknowledgment of the obligation which it entails. The press of Texas has long enjoyed a reputation extending far beyond the borders of the State. It is a vital force in the intellectual, political, moral, and material life of our people.

It is because the press so accurately measures our progress in so many fields that, though a layman, I am induced to speak to you on Free Government and Free Press. Political freedom and freedom of the press have had such intimate association in their development and still are so interdependent, it has seemed to me appropriate to discuss their relation before this distinguished company.

To-day when the reader may read in numerous newspapers within a few hours of their issue the news from all parts of the world, and editorial and other comment on the action of governments and of men, it is difficult to envisage the periods, not distantly remote, in which the battle for the freedom which the press enjoys to-day was waged. In the Anglo-Saxon struggle for liberty in England and in America all of its triumphs were not on the field of battle. Freedom to think and the right to express opinion by speech and through the press were deemed essential for the correction of abuses and as necessary to preserve the liberty of the citizen as armed revolution was to secure it.

It has been said that "Liberty of opinion has been the last political right that has been gained by the people." Its expression was for centuries dependent upon the will of the sovereign. The monarch ruled without consulting either the will or the opinions of his subjects. To-day public opinion lies at the very roots of democracy and representative government.

EARLY STRUGGLE OF PRESS

With the invention of the printing press by Gutenberg and its improvement, by the end of the fifteenth century newspapers had been established in Venice, Cologne, Copenhagen, Paris, and Amsterdam. More than 120 years expired before The Weekley Newes was established in England, in 1622. It was forced to confine itself to "newes from forain partes." The Tudors and the Stuarts suppressed the discussion of local affairs. The crown claimed the right under its general prerogative to license printers and booksellers and to thus maintain a monopoly.

In 1637 a stringent order was issued by the Star Chamber, that great engine of censorship and tyranny, preventing the importation of books printed abroad to the scandal of religion or the church or government and the printing of any book not lawfully licensed. The same restriction was exercised by the Long Parliament after the abolition of the Star Chamber. It was against an ordinance of that body, in 1643, that John Milton directed his Aeropagitica, a Speech for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing. Among other things Milton said, "Give me liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely according to conscience above all other liberties." Under the licensing act objections were made by the licenser against lines 594–599 of the first book of Paradise Lost. Charles II, in 1660, by proclamation, suppressed Milton's A Defense for the English People. A desire to suppress criticism is not inherent alone in kings. It is possessed by other forms of government.

Under Cromwell's Commonwealth persons printing reports of the proceedings of Parliament were subject to prosecution. A resolution prevented news reporters from "intermeddling with their debates or other proceedings or giving any account or minute of the debates." In the days of the Stuarts visitors were excluded from Parliament on the ground that their absence was an aid to liberty, since a member was protected against his words being taken down for future condemnation in the courts of the king. With their overthrow exclusion was continued for political purposes. With the restoration of Charles II the freedom of the press was practically destroyed.

In 1680 a judge declared that when by the King's command the judges were to give an opinion as to what was to be done toward the regulation of the press, they advised that to print or publish any newspaper or pamphlet of news was illegal. He declared that proof of publication was proof of guilt, and that the court alone could determine the issues of malice and libel. The judges refused to submit to the jury any issue except of publication. The judges were appointed by the King and were powerful instruments of oppression. It was around the right of the jury to pass upon intent and malice that the great battles of the future revolved. Finally in 1694 the Commons refused to renew the licensing act, which had given the Government control of the press. Though anyone might print what he would, he was held responsible to a rigid interpretation by the courts. The truth of the publication was not a defense. Almost a century later Lord Mansfield declared, "The greater the truth the greater the libel."

Parliament by a standing order forbade the publication of its proceedings. Notwithstanding such restrictions, the press secured and published reports. Dr. Samuel Johnson wrote parliamentary reports from 1740–1743 and published them. To circumvent the prohibition of the publication of debates, they were represented as taking place in the "Senate of Great Lilliput." Magazines reported the oratory of Mark Antony, Brutus, and other characters as taking place in the "Political Club."

HOW PROSECUTION HELPED

Two famous prosecutions for libel aided the fight for greater liberty. John Wilkes was a member of the House of Commons. In 1763 in an issue of the North Briton he discussed the King's speech to Parliament. Though his attack was upon the King's minister as the author of the speech, it was charged that he had insulted the King. He defied the King's general warrant, but upon a special warrant he was tried and convicted for printing and publishing a seditious libel. The Commons unseated him. At once the case became a political issue. He stood for Parliament and was again elected and again denied a seat. Again elected he was again turned from its doors. On his fourth election his opponent was seated. On his fifth election a new Parliament seated him.

The echoes of the Wilkes case had hardly subsided when there appeared the celebrated letter of Junius addressed to the King. The author was unknown, but a publisher was prosecuted for seditious libel. Though Lord Mansfield instructed the jury that they had no power to determine the intention, the malice, or the sedition, but only the fact of publication, opinion had been so aroused that the jury returned an uncertain verdict and a new trial was granted. On the trial of another publisher of the letter the jury disregarded Mansfield's instructions and acquitted the accused.

These and other trials reacted tremendously upon public opinion in England. Erskine's great speeches in libel cases, among others that of the case of Tom Paine, for publishing the Rights of Man, impressed the public mind.

With the advancement of the English people toward self-government, the desire for a free press increased step by step. The doctrines of Mansfield were definitely repudiated by the Fox libel act in the time of George III. Fox, the great Liberal leader, said: "Speech ought to be completely free. Take away the freedom of speech or writing and the foundation of all freedom is gone." His bill gave the jury the right to judge the intent and tendency of the defendant's words and to acquit the accused for criticisms of the government and men, except where charges were made with illegal intention.

TRUTH MADE DEFENSE

Not yet was complete freedom attained. It was not until 1843 that England provided that truth could be pleaded as a defense, on a plea that its publication was in the public interest. By steady progress the English press may be said to have found its complete freedom. Though Edmund Burke, in referring to the futility of an opposition member making an impression in his day, complained: "In the House he votes forever in a dispirited minority. If he speaks the doors are locked," parliamentary proceedings are no longer withheld from the public. The advances have been made almost without the aid of legislation. It progressed through the growth and strength of public opinion. Like other rights under the British Constitution, it is not guaranteed by any written constitutional provision. It is protected alone by British custom and tradition which have come to have the force of law.

THE STRUGGLE IN AMERICA

In tracing the development of freedom in the United States, the English background must always be kept in mind. During the period when the American Colonies were being provoked to revolution the struggle over the freedom of the press in England was acute. It had its reactions here. The more liberal attitude had the support of the colonists.

One of the interesting libel prosecutions prior to the Revolution was that of John Franklin. He had criticized the general court, the legislative branch in Massachusetts, and the governor, and was sentenced to a month's imprisonment. During his incarceration his younger brother, Ben, operated his paper. Benjamin was being prepared for the brilliant battles of his mature years in behalf of liberty.

The celebrated trial of Zenger was the occasion of the decision of two problems—the right to record and discuss the acts of government, and the right of juries to decide the intent rather than the mere fact of publication. Many editions of the report of the trial were published, both in the Colonies and in England. Gouverneur Morris referred to it as the "dawn of that liberty which afterwards revolutionized America." Zenger attacked Cosby, the royal Governor of New York, and was imprisoned nearly nine months before trial. However, he continued to publish his Journal. He said that by speaking through a hole in the door of the prison to his wife and servant he hoped to continue his weekly Journal as formerly. Counsel for Zenger was able to influence the jury to disregard the instructions of the court, which reserved to the judge the right to determine whether or not the publication was libelous, and secured a favorable verdict.

The Continental Congress in October, 1774, in an address to the inhabitants of Quebec, asserted that the colonists were entitled to five notable rights—representative government, trial by jury, liberty of the person, easy tenure of land, and freedom of the press. They claimed them as Englishmen.

CONSTITUTION AMENDED

It is noticeable that the original draft of the Constitution of the United States did not contain a clause assuring freedom to the press. However, the first Congress submitted to the States the first 10 amendments, which have come to be known as the American bill of rights. The first amendment protects the press in the following language:

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peacefully to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

The amendment became effective in 1791. That date marks for the United States the constitutional recognition of the freedom of the press from arbitrary Federal power.

A test was soon to come. The spirit of passionate partisanship that raged during the administration of John Adams brought forth the alien and sedition laws of 1798. Our difficulties with France and Great Britain produced rancor and bitterness at home. The opposition press charged that the administration and the Federalists were partisans of Great Britain. The Federalists retorted that the Republicans were French Jacobins. The sedition bill was designed to silence criticism of the Federalist administration. When first drafted it was more severe than its final form. Alexander Hamilton was astounded at its harsh provisions. He exclaimed, "Why establish a tyranny?" It was enacted on July 10, 1798. One of its notable victims was Matthew Lyon, of Vermont. Lyon was a Member of Congress, and when Vermont papers refused to publish his address to his constituents he established a paper of his own. Among other things he printed a letter from Barlow, the poet, referring to "the bullying speech of your President and the stupid answer of your Senate." For the publication of that criticism Lyon was sentenced to four months in jail and assessed a fine of $1,000. The trial was farcical and partial. He was incarcerated in a small cell, and was refused writing materials. In the meantime popular fury against the alien and sedition laws was growing in strength. The sentiment for democracy and Jefferson, its leader, were increasing. The people feared an era of proscription under these obnoxious measures. Lyon was nominated for Congress. The Federalists were amazed. Lyon was elected overwhelmingly. Jefferson and his friends raised the amount of his fine.

Upon his release he was triumphantly escorted through New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania amidst ovations. Out of the Lyon case grew another prosecution. Anthony Haswell, a man who had served in the Army of Washington, had appealed for funds to pay the fine of Lyon through the columns of his Gazette and had attacked the administration. He was convicted of sedition. There were other cases of arbitrary and tyrannical employment of the act. Opposition to these repressive and un-American measures gained so rapidly that public opinion was aroused. The Virginia and Kentucky resolutions in protest appeared. The triumph of Jefferson, who had led the fight against the alien and sedition laws, was assured in the election of 1800. The repeal of these hated acts brought to an end a dramatic and historic struggle.

NOW FIRMLY ESTABLISHED

It may be said that in America the freedom of the press is firmly and permanently established. The first amendment to the Constitution, however, was merely a limitation upon the power of the Congress. The States were still free to exercise their own power over the press.

The constitutions of Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and North Carolina, adopted in 1776, contained the earliest declarations favorable to its liberty. To-day most, if not all, of the constitutions of the States contain some similar guaranty. Under constitutional provisions and legislative acts of Texas, newspapers are now privileged to publish "fair, true, and impartial" reports of the proceedings of the courts, unless prohibited by the court, of executive and legislative proceedings, of the transactions at public meetings and reasonable and fair comment and criticism of official acts.

I shall not undertake to discuss the law of libel as it relates to other than public affairs. The right of the citizen to privacy in those matters in which the public has no legitimate concern, and the value of personal reputation rest upon a sound basis. They spring from the same liberty guaranteed to the citizen that the freedom of the press is intended to secure by turning its spotlight upon public questions. To publish a false statement regarding an individual to his injury, or to invade his proper privacy is as much an injustice as the confiscation of his property or his unmerited imprisonment by a tyrannical government. The same power that shields the citizen from undue search or seizure of his papers or effects owes him the duty of protection from undue invasion of his affairs. The public liberty ends where individual liberty begins.

Neither is there warrant for the publication of vicious or obscene matter, which tends to the corruption of morals or the creation of criminal enterprises. The utmost freedom regarding government and the proper censorship of officials are quite different things from unbridled license to print shocking or salacious details not related to public affairs. The press as a whole observes the proprieties in such cases without the compulsion of law. Only a small and disreputable fraction must be restrained.

PUBLIC INTEREST GOVERNS

Freedom of the press was established in the public interest. It was not intended to gratify the curiosity or satisfy a craving to pry into the affairs of individuals. It was not provided to please newspapers or publishers. Its grant devolved upon the press a public function. Because it is essential to political liberty, it is protected. Thomas Jefferson, in 1787, said: "The basis of our Government being the opinion of the people, the very first object should be to keep that right; and were it left to me to decide whether we should have a government without newspapers or newspapers without a government, I should not hesitate a moment to prefer the latter."

Again, 1799, in a letter to Elbridge Gerry, he wrote: "I am for freedom of the press and against all violations of the Constitution to silence by force and not by reason the complaints or criticisms, just or unjust, of our citizens against the conduct of their agents."

Though Jefferson was bitterly abused and vilified by the Federalist press, he adhered to these views. His correspondence abounds in references to the value and necessity of a free press, though he complained that his antagonists had published falsehoods regarding him. In the party struggles of the Jefferson and Jackson periods, newspapers, both large and small, were as a rule bitterly partisan. However, they exerted a strong influence. In their columns were carried in full many of the important speeches delivered in the House and Senate on the epochal questions of those remarkable periods. The individuality of the editor or owner was written all over their pages. They reflected his views and frequently his political bias and prejudice. Many were denunciatory and extremely bitter. Frequently they resorted to grotesque caricature and ridicule.

MUST PRINT TRUTH

There has been marvelous development since that era. To-day when so many of our people read the daily press, its influence upon public opinion is almost impossible of estimate. It has within its power to make or unmake public issues. The fortunes of measures and candidates are often in its hands. Upon its news columns the public depends for its information as to public transactions. Its editorial pages potently influence their conclusions from the facts. In recent years the special and syndicated writer has become an important factor. By reporting purported fact and artfully intermingling comment and opinion of his own into the fabric of the article, it subtly and ingeniously colors the mind of the reader. These are the methods of the political propagandist. The press, no doubt, is persistently beset by those who would use its columns for propaganda. And therein the newspaper has a great responsibility. It is its duty to print the truth. There is, however, great difficulty to be met in that regard. The quest of truth is not always an easy task. The highest form of service that can be rendered to the public by any instrumentality is to learn the truth and then give that truth to other men. That is the lofty mission of the press.

With its astounding and its ever-increasing power over the mass mind, its responsibilities and duties are commensurately increased. Upon the press there rests a peculiar duty to the public. It subsists upon public patronage. Its very life depends upon the hearing which it receives. Its fortunes vibrate as does that of the ear drum of the public. It owes to its readers and to the public an obligation to relate fully the facts regarding the Government and public affairs. It possesses facilities for ascertaining accurate and complete information with relation to men and issues which the citizen as an individual can never possess. In its larger sweep it is both the eye and the ear of the citizen. He may read the history of the past in books. He reads the history of to-day in the press.

SHOULD BE SUPPORTED

But if the press owes a duty to the public, there rests upon the public a very distinct obligation to the press, and that is the obligation to support it. Many forms of service are rendered by the newspaper. The paper of purely local circulation, as well as the paper of wide circulation, performs a valuable function. The country weekly just as the city daily has its sphere of service. Community life and civic enterprises make many drafts upon its columns for which there is no monetary return. The editor is expected to lead in local enterprises. His time and talents are drafted. Charitable and public organizations must be served. The press should have the financial support of the public which it serves. It ought to be independent in purse as well as in thought. Advertisers and readers are just as necessary as news. The press can not render the highest service when the editor must constantly fight for financial existence. If the press is to support the cause of the public, it must in turn have the support of the people.

LIFTS VEIL OF SECRECY

Secrecy in government is contrary to the genius of a free people. It was against the closed doors of the star chamber that the champions of English liberty hurled their attacks. The press alone can destroy such secrecy. The Constitution gives to debates in Congress absolute privilege. Representatives and Senators may utter what they please in their respective Houses and may not be held to answer for their words in any other place. That freedom, however, would avail little if the press did not carry their words to the people.

In the early days of the Republic the Houses of Congress frequently transacted their business behind closed doors. The House of Representatives first abandoned that practice. Freneau, of the party of Jefferson, attacked the Senate for its secrecy. Among other things he said: "Can there be any question of legislative importance which freemen should not be acquainted with? What are you to expect when stewards of your household refuse to give account of their stewardship? Secrecy is necessary to design a masque to treachery; honesty shrinks not from the public eye."

Gradually, however, public opinion compelled reform until at present secret sessions of the Senate are confined to action on appointments and the consideration of treaties. In quite recent times, although the ban of secrecy has not always been invoked in such cases, it is generally observed. The public is concerned with presidential appointments of officers and diplomats. The power which they are to exercise is the people's power. Their salaries are paid from the people's treasury. Of all the officers and employees of the Federal establishment, consisting of several hundred thousands, only 531 are elected by the people—435 Representatives, 96 Senators, and the President and the Vice President. All of the remainder secure their tenure by appointment of the Executive. Treaties with foreign governments are, within their proper province, binding on the citizen. They involve peace and war. They hold the fate of nations. Our relations with foreign nations may call the boys of the land to the red fields of battle and waste the national treasure. Woodrow Wilson put his finger on the seat of international intrigue and conspiracy that have spilled the blood of millions and caused countless misery when he denounced secret diplomacy as the author of the woes of war. Substantial progress in the direction of peace has been attained in the registration and publication of treaties.

There can be urged no satisfactory reason why these vital concerns of the people should be considered behind the mask of secrecy. Why should the reasons for and against the confirmation of ambassadors be buried in the public archives? Why should the merits and demerits of those who are to sit as judges for life—to rule over the life and property of the citizen—be withheld from the public? Why should appointments to commissions and bureaus that exercise power over the people be confirmed behind closed doors? Why should the Senate screen from the view of the public its deliberations upon treaties that pledge the lives and fortunes of its citizens? The business of the people should be transacted in the open. There should be no chamber the people can not enter. There should be no whispered words that the ear of the people can not hear—no screen behind which the eye of the people can not see. The Senate should open its doors.

Tyrannical governments have in all times feared the press. Wrongs and abuses endeavor to hide themselves. Arbitrary and cruel despotism can not long survive in the pitiless sunlight. When men can witness in the open the making and administration of measures which oppress and exploit them they will not long be tolerated. This has ever made monarchs and autocrats the enemies of a free press. To-day Mussolini in his dream of Empire is more and more suppressing the freedom of speech and the press as he gradually gathers into his hands all of the powers of the Italian State.

In our neighbor State of New Mexico, within recent years, a courageous fight was made by a member of the press against the tyranny of a judge. Carl Magee in resisting the pretensions of power of an arrogant autocrat deserves not alone your gratitude but that of the people. Publicity is a relentless enemy of wrongdoing. A vivid example is at hand. In publishing the revelations of the Walsh investigating committee and the scandals that disgraced the Department of Justice and other branches of the Government, the press rendered an outstanding and useful service to the country. Again in presenting the details of the primary elections in Pennsylvania, wherein $3,000,000 were poured into the ballot boxes of that State, and in Illinois where a million dollars tarnished the voting booths of the people, it disclosed to the people these dangerous attacks upon self-government. The publication of these astounding expenditures crystalized a public opinion which was almost instantaneously reflected in Washington. It is doubtful if either of the Senators nominated in such primaries will ever be allowed to take his seat in the Senate.

RIGHT TO CRITICIZE UPHELD

The power of the Executive in foreign affairs is such that he may, without consulting the people, commit the country to a policy from which it may not without embarrassment recede or place the country in a posture of grave difficulty. Because of criticism of the Executive's course in foreign affairs within recent months, President Coolidge in his New York speech of April 25, 1927, said:

"Whenever any section of our press turns on America and on American institutions, and assumes a foreign attitude, every informed person knows that it has fallen from the high estate which is our common heritage, and, becoming no longer worthy of regard, is destined to defeat and failure. No American can profit by selling his own country for foreign favor."

This charge was resented by the majority of the press. The Republican, Camden (N. J.) Post replied: "Better have honest newspapers which disagree with the administration than a fawning press, which coddles the party in power." The Detroit-News remarks: "We lack evidence that Secretary Kellogg is omniscient," while the New York World, observes: "One would have supposed that Mr. Coolidge had lived long enough—to realize that neither Frank B. Kellogg—nor the elegant young men in the State Department are directly inspired." The Louisville Times exclaims: "Tut, tut, Mr. President. A press which criticizes you and Mr. Kellogg is criticizing you and Mr. Kellogg, not America and American institutions." The secrecy of the State Department and its failure to give the facts to the press aroused its distrust and criticism. There is no freedom if it is to be confined to adulation and applause of an administration and its brief authority. Fawning sycophants could flatter rulers before the dawn of freedom. The freedom to oppose and expose, to express unfavorable as well as favorable opinion, is alone real freedom. It protects foolish opinion as well as wise opinion. It is a forum in which error has its chance. Truth ought not to fear the contest. Public opinion is more powerful than party platforms. It is more compelling than caucuses or conventions. It is the dominant force in the life of this Republic. In large measure that opinion is molded by the press. The newspapers of America can arouse the people to a high pitch of enthusiasm for a cause or sweep them with passion into opposition. But the freedom of the press is not a private possession of a newspaper to be enjoyed as its private property. It is a possession of all free men. It is a sacred public trust. Its exercise is vested in the press to serve all men. For political freedom patriots have suffered the hardships of camp and have died upon a hundred bloody fields. In the battles for the freedom of the press, heroic men have languished in foul jails. They have braved the tyranny of despots—they have had their presses and property destroyed. Inch by inch, its standard has been advanced, until to-day it enjoys a power and prestige unsurpassed by any other single agency in the life of our people.

FREE PRESS VALUABLE

A press of independence, a press whose business office does not overawe its editorial rooms, a press whose columns carry the truth, a press of high courage and patriotism, is one of the richest possessions of a free people.

Before revolution against wrong can be generated there must arise a consciousness of wrong and a will to right it. Before abuses can be corrected we must know of their existence. Before corruption can be punished it must be dragged from the darkness in which it hides out into the light. Before a fraud can be revealed there must be torn from it the mask that conceals its dissembling face. We must have a free press if we are to have a free government.

Here in America has been set up the great experiment in self-government. Here popular government under a written constitution is on trial. Here democracy is now being tested, and here it is to be tested in the years to come. The United States is to answer whether our institutions are to join those that live no more. Here is to be settled whether men at the ballot box in time of peace can hold fast to liberties won at the point of the bayonet in time of war. When the ragged soldiers who had shivered and suffered amidst the rigors of Valley Forge and the hardy mountaineers who had fought at Cowpens and Kings Mountain gathered under the banners of Washington and at Yorktown triumphed over royal armies they pulled down the ensign of a king and lifted high the standard of a people. The divine right of kings was dead. The Constitution of the United States was erected upon the theory that all political power resides in the people. By written guaranties the citizen is protected against the power of government. Liberty under a constitutional democracy was given to the world. Under its inspiration the people of France rose and struck from their cramped and festering limbs the shackles of centuries. It gave courage to the heart of Bolivar as he liberated Latin America from the yoke of Spain. It stirred aspirations for liberty in many lands. It gave impulse to constitutionalism wherever it struggled with absolutism. It has endured for 140 years. It has stood the stress of war from without and has survived the shock of war from within. It has weathered many storms. A decade ago it plunged into a war that rocked the globe and spilled the blood of millions. It saved democracy for the world. It must now save democracy for itself. It must be saved from the tyranny of a Lenin and the despotism of a Mussolini. It must be saved from corrupt elections and bribed officials. It must be saved from the indifference of its citizens and from the perversion of its powers to selfish and sordid ends. Only the people themselves can save it. They can save it only when they are informed as to the state of their Government and the influences they must combat. To the press they must look for the truth. In their name it was given its freedom. Their blood purchased the liberty which it enjoys. Its high destiny, its lofty mission, is to use its own freedom to secure and to give to the people that truth which shall make them free.

SENATE

TUESDAY, February 7, 1928

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Father of all mercies, we bless Thee for all that Thou art in Thyself, to us as yet unknown, and for all that Thou revealest from day to day. For every creature that ministers to our need; for our homes, our loved ones, and our friends; for the examples of the past and the counsels of the present; for Thine infinite blessings to our fathers and Thy promises to their children—make us truly thankful. And give us such a sense of all Thy mercies that we may show forth Thy praise, not only with our lips but in our lives, by giving up ourselves to Thy service and by walking before Thee in holiness and righteousness all the days of our life. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to enter a motion to reconsider the votes whereby the bill (H. R. 7009) to authorize appropriations for construction at military posts, and for other purposes, was ordered to a third reading and passed. The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reconsideration of the votes by which House bill 7009 was ordered to a third reading and passed, together with a reconsideration of the appointment of conferees? The Chair hears none; and it is so ordered. The Senator from Kansas offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] was appointed one of the conferees on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses arising in connection with the independent offices appropriation bill. The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLEASE in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] be appointed a conferee on the independent offices appropriation bill in place of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, instructed, if not incompatible with the public interest, to inform the Senate, first, the facts relative to the use of the Navy in Nicaragua since the recognition of the Diaz government; the extent of the naval force, both as to ships and as to men; the number of conflicts had with armed forces in Nicaragua; the number of individuals killed or wounded on either side; and such other data as will enable the Senate to have before it all the facts relative to the use of the Navy in Nicaragua; together with the report of the naval officers to the Secretary of the Navy touching matters in Nicaragua.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from California if he desires to be heard on the resolution?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I would answer yes, but may I say to the Senator from Idaho that I have been under the impression that the resolution should be considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations. I was about to suggest that it be referred to that committee; and then, if the committee should report it, we could, of course, consider it in all of its bearings.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course I have no objection to the resolution going to the committee, except in the interest of time. The committee has before it a number of resolutions providing for inquiries in regard to facts touching affairs in Nicaragua. I was of the opinion that if this resolution could be adopted and we could have this official report it would enlighten the committee as to what it should do with reference to the other resolutions and what scope they should take when we finally reported them. However, if it is the desire of the Senator from California first to have action of the committee——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I should very much prefer that, I will say to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I will let the resolution go to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PRESIDENTIAL TERMS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 128) submitted by Mr. LA FOLLETTE on January 31, 1928, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents of the United States in retiring from the presidential office after their second term, has become, by universal concurrence, a part of our republican system of government, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions; and be it further

Resolved, That the Senate commends observance of this precedent by the President.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss this resolution at great length. Its terms are simple; it speaks for itself. Furthermore, the antithird term tradition is so deeply rooted in our history that to discuss the subject elaborately would be unnecessary in this body.

Mr. President, the questions of the reeligibility to the Presidency and the length of the term which the President should serve were discussed very fully in the Constitutional Convention. The convention reversed itself many times both on the question of the length of the term and the question of reeligibility. Suffice it to say that as the deliberations of the convention were drawing to a close the convention reverted to the seven-year term, with ineligibility for reelection. That was on July 26, 1787. Apparently the subject was not again discussed until late in August, when the convention returned to the plan for the choice of President by the National Legislature, with the proviso that he should hold his office during seven years, but should not be elected a second time.

It was not until September 15 that the final plan for the choice of President for a term of four years was agreed upon, with the provision regarding reeligibility omitted. The Constitutional Convention two days thereafter concluded its deliberations and its work and adjourned.

It is a well-known fact to those who have looked into the subject that the question of reeligibility was one which greatly concerned Thomas Jefferson. He was at that time our diplomatic representative in Paris. He wrote to George Washington under date of May 2, 1788, and I quote a portion of his letter. Discussing the question of reeligibility, he said:

> This, I fear, will make an office for life. I was much an enemy of monarchy before I came to Europe. I am ten thousand times more so since I have seen what they are. * * * I shall hope that before there is danger of this change taking place in the office of President the good sense and free spirit of our countrymen will make the change necessary to prevent it. Under this hope I look forward to the general adoption of the new Constitution with anxiety as necessary for us under our present circumstances.

An accurate recital of history, however, Mr. President, requires the admission that President Washington was not in agreement with Thomas Jefferson in so far as his fears of reeligibility were concerned. He wrote a letter to Lafayette in 1788, in which he said, in part:

> Guarded so effectively as the proposed Constitution is, in respect to the prevention of bribery and undue influence in the choice of President, I confess I differ widely myself from Mr. Jefferson and as to the necessity or expediency of rotation in that department.

However, Mr. President, after Washington had served his two terms as President of the United States—and all historians agree in telling us that had he so desired he could have been elected a third time—he declined to accept the office for a third term. There can be no question but that his action was the precedent which established the antithird-term tradition in American history.

I shall not digress to quote certain portions of his Farewell Address, because they are familiar to every Senator.

Jefferson, elected to the Presidency, immediately after his second inauguration in 1805 announced that he would not again be a candidate. Requested by the legislatures of five States in 1807 to reconsider his action, he addressed his famous letter to the Vermont Legislature under date of December 10, 1807. In that letter he said:

> That I should lay down my charge at a proper period is as much a duty as to have borne it faithfully. If some termination to the services of the Chief Magistrate be not fixed by the Constitution, or supplied by practice, his office, nominally four years, will in fact become for life, and history shows how easily that degenerates into an inheritance. Believing that a representative government, responsible at short periods of election, is that which produces the greatest sum of happiness to mankind, I feel it a duty to do no act which shall essentially impair that principle, and I should unwillingly be the person who, disregarding the sound precedent set by an illustrious predecessor, should furnish the first example of prolongation beyond a second term of office.

Mr. President, as is well known, Jefferson was succeeded in the office of President by Madison, and Madison was succeeded by Monroe. Both of those Presidents served two terms, and voluntarily retired at the end of their second terms.

Jefferson regarded this action taken by Washington, by himself, and by his two successors in office as having firmly established the precedent that a President should retire after a second term.

In his autobiography, written shortly before his death, Jefferson explained that his fears of perpetual reeligibility had been founded—> on the importance of the office, on the fierce contentions it might excite among ourselves if continuable for life, and the dangers of interference either with money or arms by foreign nations to whom the choice of an American President might become interesting.

He goes on to say:

> My wish, therefore, was that the President should be elected for seven years and be ineligible afterward. This term I thought sufficient to enable him, with the concurrence of the legislature, to carry through and establish any system of improvement he should propose for the general good. But the practice adopted I think is better, allowing his continuance for eight years, with a liability to be dropped at the halfway of the term, making that a period of probation.

Mr. President, the next President who was confronted with a popular demand by his friends that he should consider breaking down this tradition was Andrew Jackson; this in spite of the fact that in his first message to Congress he recommended the abolition of the Electoral College and the direct election of the President by the vote of the people. In that message he declared:

> In connection with such an amendment it would seem advisable to limit the service of the Chief Magistrate to a single term of either four or six years.

President Jackson renewed that recommendation, he declared, "with increased confidence" in his second annual message, and repeated it in his third, fourth, fifth, and sixth annual messages to Congress.

A generation later Andrew Johnson, in a special message to Congress, said that he felt called upon "by an imperative sense of duty to revive the recommendation so often and earnestly made by President Jackson."

General Grant was the next President in our history upon whom fell the responsibility of deciding whether or not he should become a candidate for reelection following his second term. He had a tremendous popularity. He was besought on all sides by his political friends to consider a breach of this tradition. However, popular sentiment against such action welled up in the country, and finally resulted in action being taken by the Legislature of Pennsylvania in which they declared their opposition to the election to the Presidency of any person for a third term. This action elicited from President Grant his famous letter in which he said, in part:

> Now for the third term. I do not want it any more than I did the first.

He went on further to cite the fact that the people under the Constitution were not prohibited from choosing a President for a third term, and declared that he "would not accept a nomination if it were tendered, unless it should come under such circumstances as to make it an imperative duty—circumstances not likely to arise."

However, President Grant's political supporters in the country interpreted that letter not to mean a formal and final declination of a third nomination, and proceeded to endeavor to create a situation in the country which would fall within the conditions set down in his letter. Then it was that a resolution on the subject was introduced in the House of Representatives in 1875. That resolution was introduced by William M. Springer, of Illinois, a Democrat. In terms it conforms to the resolution now under consideration by the Senate.

The resolution was adopted in the House of Representatives without debate and by the immense majority of 234 to 18, with 38 not voting. James A. Garfield voted for the resolution, all of the Democrats present voted for the resolution, and 70 of the 88 Republicans present cast their votes for the resolution. On that roll call will be found the names of former Senators Frye and Hale, of Maine, and former Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts.

Mr. President, I desire also to quote a paragraph from the speech of acceptance made by Grover Cleveland in accepting the Democratic presidential nomination. He said:

> When we consider the patronage of this great office, the allurements of power, the temptation to retain public office once gained, and, more than all, the availability a party finds in an incumbent whom a horde of officeholders, with a zeal born of benefits received and fostered by the hope of favors yet to come, stand ready to aid with money and trained political assistance, we recognize in the eligibility of the President for reelection the most serious danger to that calm, deliberate, and intelligent action which must characterize a government by the people.

The next time this question arose was during the administration of President Roosevelt. It will be remembered that he had served three years and five and one-half months of the term of President McKinley, whom he succeeded. He was elected to succeed himself as President in 1904, and on the afternoon of election day he issued the following statement:

> I am deeply sensible of the honor done me by the American people in thus expressing their confidence in what I have done and have tried to do. I appreciate to the full the solemn responsibility that confidence imposes upon me, and I shall do all that in my power lies not to forfeit it. On the 4th of March next I shall have served three and one-half years, and that three and one-half years constitutes my first term. The wise custom which limits the President to two terms regards the substance and not the form, and under no circumstances will I be a candidate for or accept another nomination.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there for a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. WATSON. I am not asking the question in a controversial spirit at all——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I appreciate that.

Mr. WATSON. But I desire to hear the Senator's views.

What does the Senator mean by "two terms"? Suppose the President dies the week before his term expires and the Vice President becomes the President and is elected again. When it comes around to the next election, does the Senator mean for us to put the interpretation on his resolution that the President has served two terms? What does the Senator mean, in other words, by "two terms"?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in that respect I find myself in agreement with former President Roosevelt when he declared that the observance of this precedent regarded the substance and not the form. The danger in this situation is the exercise of the tremendous power which the Executive wields through the control of patronage and through the emoluments of his office. The danger in this situation that such power should be exercised twice in succession by the same individual is the crux of this matter, as I see it.

Mr. WATSON. If the Senator will pardon me once more, the Senator construes his resolution, then, to mean that if a person shall twice have taken the oath as President of the United States, that constitutes two terms?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, that is a correct interpretation; and, as stated a moment ago, it makes little difference whether the President shall have served a few months or a few years. The political power of the Chief Executive descends upon him when he takes the oath of office, and those who have had any experience in this body have seen plenty of examples of that power.

Mr. WATSON. May I ask the Senator another question without interrupting him? Does the Senator construe his resolution to mean that if there shall have been an interim, the President after that would be eligible or ineligible for reelection?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I think the plain, simple language of the resolution covers that matter.

Mr. WATSON. It means two successive terms?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It means two successive terms. If the Senator will refer to line 4 of the resolution he will see, I think, the plain intent of it.

Now, I desire to hurry along, although I shall be glad to answer any questions.

It is true that when Theodore Roosevelt, after having retired from the Presidency in 1908, became a candidate in 1912, an effort was made to make use against him of the statement which he had issued. He declared, however, that it had no application whatever to the candidacy of a man who was not at that time in office, whether he had or had not been President before.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator, with pleasure.

Mr. BORAH. I only wish to interrupt to say that if the general principle be sound, that is not a sound exception.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I was merely offering that statement as the answer of President Roosevelt when the effort was made to make use of his previous statement.

Mr. BORAH. I did not understand that it was the Senator's view.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No, Mr. President.

Mr. BORAH. But that was the practice, for instance, that Diaz put into operation in Mexico very successfully.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Exactly; I agree with the Senator fully about it; but I wish to be fair in my brief historical summary.

The Democratic convention in Baltimore in 1912, following the campaign in which the third-term issue had been raised, adopted a plank which declared:

> We favor a single presidential term, and to that end urge the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution making the President of the United States ineligible for reelection, and we pledge the candidate of this convention to this principle.

The Senate of the United States in 1913 passed a constitutional amendment which provides:

> The term of office of the President shall be six years; and no person who has held the office by election and discharged its powers or duties, or acted as President under the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof, shall be eligible to hold again the office by election.

That amendment passed the Senate on February 1, 1913, by a vote of 47 ayes to 23 nays, one vote more than the required two-thirds majority.

Mr. President, everyone is familiar with the existing situation which confronts the American people. President Coolidge on August 2 issued a statement in which he declared that he did not choose to run in 1928. It is a well-known fact that that statement was not considered a conclusive declaration, and his close political friends, some of them Members of this body, continued to insist that he would be renominated and reelected. Therefore it was with a great deal of interest that the country read the special press release attached to the President's speech given to the national committee which met here on December 6. He amplified his statement to this effect:

> This is naturally the time to be planning for the future. The party will soon place in nomination its candidate to succeed me. To give time for mature deliberation, I stated to the country on August 2 that I did not choose to run for President in 1928. My statement stands. No one should be led to suppose that I have modified it. My decision will be respected. After I had been eliminated the party began, and should vigorously continue, the serious task of selecting another candidate from among the number of distinguished men available.

Mr. President, the first interpretation placed upon that statement was that the President had eliminated himself, but obviously recent developments demonstrate that in not using complete and conclusive language in defining his position he has opened the door to those who believe that he should be renominated and who believe that this antithird-term tradition should be smashed.

Powerful persons in the Republican Party are the backers of this movement to draft the President and to force his renomination and endeavor to secure his reelection. Under those circumstances, Mr. President, it seems to me that it is the duty of this body, in so far as it represents the people of the United States, to take cognizance of this situation and to adopt this resolution.

The feeling with regard to the third term of a President is not based upon an idle fear. The power and the prestige of the Chief Executive have grown continuously since the foundation of our Government. Students of politics, both American and foreign, properly regard the President of the United States as the most powerful individual in the world. Establishment of the precedent that one man may continue to wield this power for longer than eight years would mark a definite step toward the abrogation of popular government.

Once the precedent has been broken that no one should hold the office for more than eight years, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to prevent reelection for 12, for 16, and perhaps for 20 years.

Mr. President, it may perhaps not be amiss to review briefly purely the political power which the Chief Executive now wields. There are 60,000 first, second, and third class postmasters, collectors and deputy collectors of internal revenue, marshals and deputy marshals, collectors of customs, and similar officials appointed by the President. They enjoy salaries aggregating $127,500,000 annually. In 1912 Postmaster General Hitchcock succeeded in altering the civil-service requirements governing fourth-class postmasters and rural carriers so as to permit the selection of any three upon the eligible list furnished by the Civil Service Commission, and to the total which I have just given there must be added 79,645 employees, with salaries totaling $104,100,000.

Mr. President, I believe that the Senate of the United States will recognize the gravity of this situation and will by a substantial majority place itself on record in support of this sound declaration in favor of sustaining the tradition which has played such an important part in our history. I sincerely trust that the resolution may be brought to a vote.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask leave to introduce at this time a resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the resolution.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will not the Senator be willing to allow a vote to come on my resolution?

Mr. ASHURST. Very well; I withhold my resolution for that purpose.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, there are a number of Senators who desire to be heard on the resolution presented by the Senator from Wisconsin. I have talked with several, and one or two are not prepared to go on to-day. The junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is suffering from a cold and prefers not to speak. I wonder if the Senator from Wisconsin will not let the resolution go over without prejudice. It has been going over without prejudice for some days, and none of us knew it was coming up to-day, and we are not prepared to discuss it to-day. Will he not permit it to go over without prejudice until to-morrow?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator be willing to have a unanimous-consent agreement for a vote on the resolution at some time to-morrow?

Mr. BINGHAM. That is rather a difficult question to answer.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then I ask that it be considered until 2 o'clock. I fear I shall have to object to the request of the Senator from Arizona, because there is obviously an intention to delay this resolution, and I desire to have it considered.

Mr. ASHURST. I have no intention to delay the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin, but the resolution I now seek to introduce is an important one, one to cope with an emergency. I am sure the Senator from Wisconsin, on reflection, will offer no objection to the introduction of my resolution.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have no desire to prevent its introduction, but if it is a long resolution, I ask the Senator not to have it read in the time between now and 2 o'clock.

Mr. ASHURST. My speeches and resolutions are broad and deep, but never long. I am sure the Senator will permit the clerk to read the resolution, and then let it be referred to the appropriate committee.

INVESTIGATION OF OIL COMPANIES IN CALIFORNIA AND ARIZONA

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 141), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, or a subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, empowered and directed to inquire into and report upon the alleged violations of the laws of the United States by certain oil companies maintaining refineries in the State of California and distributing stations in the State of Arizona, and which companies are alleged to have entered into an illegal combination to control the prices of gasoline and oils to independent retail distributors upon the refusal of said retail distributors to maintain such prices as are fixed by the combination of the said oil companies, and which oil companies are alleged to have entered into a conspiracy to prevent said independent retailers from securing gasoline and oils from other sources.

That the said committee is hereby authorized to sit and perform its duties at such times and places as it deems necessary or proper, and to require the attendance of witnesses by subpœnas or otherwise; to require the production of books, papers, and documents; and to employ counsel, experts, and other assistants, and stenographers, at a cost not exceeding $1.25 per printed page. The chairman of the committee, or any member thereof, may administer oaths to witnesses and sign subpœnas for witnesses; and every person duly summoned before said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, who refuses or fails to obey the process of said committee, or appears and refuses to answer questions pertinent to said investigation, shall be punished as prescribed by law. The expenses of said investigation shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers of the committee or subcommittee, signed by the chairman and approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to sit during the sessions or the recesses of the Senate, and until otherwise ordered by the Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, let the resolution be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a telegram signed by Hon. Harlow Akers, who is one of the publishers of the Arizona Daily Gazette, a metropolitan daily journal published in the city of Phoenix.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Does the resolution require the expenditure of money?

Mr. ASHURST. It does.

Mr. WARREN. Should it not go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate?

Mr. ASHURST. I think it should ultimately, but I believe it should first go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to the end that that committee may make a careful survey, and after that committee shall have reported the resolution favorably, as I hope it will, it then, under the law, must go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. Am I correct?

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I shall appeal to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce to lay this resolution before his committee, so that we may ascertain if there be violations of the law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution, without objection, will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona to have the telegram printed in the RECORD?

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PHOENIX, ARIZ., February 7, 1928.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,

United States Senate Building, Washington, D. C.:

In behalf of the citizens of Arizona I appeal to you to lay before the United States Senate the facts set forth herein, and to demand an investigation by that body of the most flagrant violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act that has been perpetrated in the Southwest. On December 9 the American Automobile Association disclosed in a nation-wide report that Arizona paid the highest retail price for gasoline of any State, 27 cents, and that in some other States gasoline sold for 10 cents, with 47 different prices prevailing throughout the Nation. A group of Phoenix retailers decided to take price cuts on January 10, and signs were posted at 25 cents. A meeting of other retailers was held January 16 and was attended by wholesale representatives, and on that night the wholesalers announced through a spokesman that dealers who had cut price to 25 cents would be cut off from deliveries at noon next day unless independents came back to price dictated by wholesalers. Men who had reduced price refused to change and were refused gasoline on January 17, and their tanks ran dry that day. Copper State Oil & Gas Co. was organized by Arizona men and buying connection was formed with outside refinery. First carload was delivered January 31 and station tanks of independents that had been dry since 17th were filled and began selling for 24 cents. Price cuts spread over valley on February 2, but stations of large companies held to 27 cents, with five different prices posted by February 3. On that day Standard Oil took motion pictures of independent operations and station men reported Standard Oil detectives were checking their sales. On February 4 refining company in Los Angeles refused to sell gasoline to Copper State Co., even though cash was tendered in payment. Every wholesale oil company in Phoenix refused to sell to Copper State on February 5, and by the 6th all independent-station tanks were empty. All price signs where gasoline is in tanks went back to 27 cents to-day. With only one exception, all companies operating in Arizona ship gasoline interstate, and this open monopoly of gasoline and its retail price is the most unbearable situation Arizona has had heaped upon it since Sherman Act became a law. Affidavits have been placed before local authorities, but situation has so many ramifications and is so clearly one for Federal investigation and prosecution that legal action has been delayed or permanently blocked. We appeal to you to demand investigation and prosecution of those guilty of this conspiracy. Am prepared to supply full information regarding individuals from whom affidavits or other sworn testimony may be obtained by investigating committee. Appreciate immediate reply, for this crime will be exposed while it still continues if investigation opens without delay.

HARLOW AKERS.

RADIO REGULATION

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article appearing in the Wilmington Evening Journal of yesterday relating to the injunction issued in New Jersey against the Radio Corporation of America.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the Wilmington Evening Journal, Monday, February 6, 1928]

INJUNCTION IS ISSUED AGAINST RADIO CORPORATION OF AMERICA—FEDERAL COURT FINDS IN BEHALF OF DE FOREST AND OTHER COMPANIES—RADIO LICENSES ARE INVOLVED

In the case of the De Forest Radio Co. and others against the Radio Corporation of America, Judge Morris at noon to-day handed down an opinion granting an injunction against the Radio Corporation of America.

The De Forest company and others brought suit in the United States district court against the defendants, alleging violation of the Clayton law. The De Forest interests were represented by Samuel E. Darby, jr., of New York, and E. E. Berl, of this city.

The Radio Corporation was represented by John W. Davis, of New York, and William G. Mahaffy, of Wilmington.

The De Forest company suit is to enjoin the enforcement by the defendant of certain licenses agreement alleged to constitute unfair methods of competition and in violation of the Sherman and Clayton Acts. The agreements were made with the General Electric Co., the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co., and 25 other manufacturers of radio and receiving sets and assented to by the American Telephone & Telegraph Co.

The plaintiff contends that the contract of sale entered into by the defendant is on the condition that the purchaser shall not use or deal in tubes of competitors of the seller.

Judge Morris in his opinion writes: "The evidence now before me is conclusive that the practical effect is to prevent the licensee from using or dealing in tubes other than those sold by the defendant. Such conditions or agreements are so completely within the ban of the Clayton Act as if they were express, specific, or direct."

The plaintiff further contends there is a contract for the sale of goods on the condition that the purchaser shall not use or deal in the goods of competitors, and that the effect of such contract for sale is to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly.

In reply the defendant contends that their contracts are license agreements and that certain provisions of these agreements attacked by the plaintiffs are lawful conditions of the licenses. They hold that the Clayton Act is a derogation of the common law and must be so construed.

Judge Morris declares that to hold that a contract for the sale of goods is not within the Clayton Act if it is embodied as a condition or covenant of a license or an agreement would be writing into the statute a nullifying limitation and running counter to the views of the Supreme Court.

Affidavits submitted by the plaintiff declares that the defendant and the 25 licensees combined approximate 95 per cent of the total business in radio receiving sets. The defendant, in turn, claims that it does not exceed 75 per cent of the business.

The plaintiffs are Arthur D. Lord, receiver for the De Forest Radio Co., the Northern Manufacturing Co., the United States Radio & Electric Corporation, the Televocal Corporation, and Harry Chirelstein, of the Sonatron Tube Corporation.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 278) to amend section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of certain public buildings, and for other purposes," approved May 25, 1926, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. KEYES. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. KEYES, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. REED of Missouri conferees on the part of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL TERMS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 128) submitted by Mr. LA FOLLETTE on January 31, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents of the United States in retiring from the presidential office after their second term has become by universal concurrence a part of our republican system of government, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions; and be it further

Resolved, That the Senate commends observance of this precedent by the President.

Mr. GILLETT obtained the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the Senator from Massachusetts will yield to me for a moment——

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the resolution now before the Senate, submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. GILLETT. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I can see no force in the argument put forth by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] that the resolution should be sent to a committee. It simply declares the sense of the Senate in relation to this important question. To send it to a committee is to send it into the chloroform chamber. I shall resist that effort, and trust that those who agree with me in regard to the resolution will resist the effort, too.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. President, like the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], I was unaware the resolution was coming up to-day, nor had I seen it until just now.

As to the first clause I make no objection. I confess I think it is somewhat exaggerated and grandiose in its phraseology. I hardly think that the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents is so essential to our Government that a failure to observe it is "fraught with peril to our free institutions." At the same time I do heartily agree that the precedent is wise and ought to be followed.

Personally, I am in sympathy with the original opinion of President Jefferson, cited by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], in favor of a term of seven years without reelection. But the Constitution did not so provide, and we have established the precedent that at the end of eight years a President shall not be reelected. The Senator from Wisconsin agrees that that applies only to successive terms, and in that I agree with him.

But when we come to the second clause of the Senator's resolution I do not agree with him. It reads:

Resolved, That the Senate commends observance of this precedent by the President.

His argument is that the President's declaration that he does not choose to run is an observance of this precedent. I do not think that for President Coolidge to run again now would be a violation of the precedents established by our earlier Presidents.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. DILL. What term does the Senator think it would be if Mr. Coolidge ran again?

Mr. GILLETT. It certainly would not be a third full term.

Mr. DILL. What term would it be, then?

Mr. GILLETT. It would be his second elective term.

Mr. DILL. But would it not be a third term?

Mr. GILLETT. No; it would be the beginning of his second term, but not a third full term.

Mr. DILL. Would it not be longer than any other President ever served?

Mr. GILLETT. It certainly would; and if that is the argument which influences Senators, I agree that it is a violation of the precedent.

Mr. DILL. If Mr. Coolidge or anyone else violates the tradition of serving more than 8 years, why not serve 12, or 16, or 20 years?

Mr. GILLETT. We might say that if President Roosevelt had been elected in 1912 he would have served longer than any other President.

Mr. DILL. I think that is one of the reasons why he was not reelected and why he did not get any more votes.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not think so, or that it was any violation of the third-term precedent. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] asked if a President has served one week and then is reelected, is it a violation of the third-term precedent? I do not believe that it would be. The answer was made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] that the taking of the oath of office more than twice is in violation of the third-term precedent. With that statement I disagree. Whether Mr. Coolidge, when he said that he did not choose to run, had in mind the third-term precedent, I do not know. I do not believe that anybody knows whether he even thought of that in making his decision. I know him very well. I know many of his most intimate friends intimately, and so far as I can find, nobody knows the reason upon which he based his determination not to run. But I have assumed, from the time he declared it, that that was his determined intention, and I have acted accordingly. While nobody, I believe, is more desirous than I that he should run again and be elected again, as he certainly could be, yet I have conceived that he has refused and I have consequently made another choice for the next candidate for President, for whom I am doing what I can. But I make no concealment of the fact that President Coolidge was my first choice, that I do not think his candidacy would violate the third-term tradition, and that the only reason I am not supporting him is his own refusal to run.

But if we adopt this resolution, which reads "That the Senate commends observance of the precedent by the President," we intimate that we believe another election for Mr. Coolidge would not be an observance of the third-term precedent. With that I do not agree. It depends, it seems to me, in some measure upon how long a President has served. When President Roosevelt declared that it was a matter of substance rather than of form, he meant that he had served practically two full terms, two terms lacking six months, and that substantially that was serving two full terms. If he had served only a few months more than four years, I do not believe he would have thought he had served in substance two terms. President Coolidge has served less than two years of President Harding's term, and consequently I do not believe that was a term either in substance or in theory. Consequently his renomination and reelection would be no violation of the third-term principle. For that reason I oppose the last clause, "Resolved, That the Senate commend observance of this precedent by the President." It intimates directly that for him to be renominated and reelected would be a violation of the third-term precedent.

The only reason why I am not now advocating President Coolidge's renomination is not that I believe it is a violation of the third-term precedent, but that he himself has declined to be a candidate for reasons known best and, I suspect, known only to himself. Therefore, while I am perfectly willing to vote for the first clause of the resolution, as expressing rather bombastically a theory on which we are all agreed, I shall not vote for the resolution when it contains, as it does in its second clause, an intimation that the renomination and reelection of President Coolidge would be a violation of the third-term precedent.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, it seems to me that this matter is one which really is a proper subject for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. There is, however, no provision of the Constitution at the present time limiting in any way the number of terms to which a President may be reelected. All amendments to the Constitution are naturally referred to the Judiciary Committee. There is nothing strange about that method of procedure even though the matter has been discussed widely throughout the country. Therefore it appears to me that there ought to be no objection to having the resolution carefully considered in the Judiciary Committee.

In view of the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin is unwilling to lay the matter aside so that those who desire to be heard on it may protect themselves until to-morrow, I should like to have a vote on the question as to whether the resolution may not be referred to the Judiciary Committee in accordance with my motion.

THIRD TERM AND ROMANIZED PRESS

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I do not see the necessity for referring this matter to the Committee on the Judiciary. It is a very simple resolution. I think most of the Senators have their minds made up on the resolution. We ought to vote on it to-day or get an agreement that we will vote upon it to-morrow. I think the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is correct in his suggestion that it might be pigeonholed in the committee, might be delayed indefinitely, and the Senate might not get a vote on it. It is already now the property of the Senate. This question has been discussed by people throughout the country. So far as I have been able to ascertain, the overwhelming sentiment is in favor of the resolution.

The two-term custom is firmly established in the minds and hearts of the American people. They do not want that custom tampered with. They do not want it broken. Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, a very distinguished Republican, sometimes a candidate for President on the Republican ticket, has said that when a President takes the oath twice he has had two terms in the minds of the American people. When he is sworn in to serve as President of the United States two times, he to all intents and purposes has had two terms.

I know that there are some Republican partisans who would like to keep Mr. Coolidge in waiting, and if they should get in a deadlock in the convention among Mr. Hoover, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], Vice President Dawes, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], Governor Lowden, of Illinois, and perhaps the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], they would then bring the President out and suggest that he be nominated in order to break the deadlock.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLEASE in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. SACKETT. That is a pretty good list, is it not?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; it is a pretty good list.

Mr. SACKETT. All able men?

Mr. HEFLIN. Very able men.

Mr. SACKETT. Any one of them would fill the office with credit to the United States?

Mr. HEFLIN. They are very able men. I do not know how creditably they would fill the office, being Republicans; but there are some of them who, if we have to have a Republican President, I would not object to seeing President.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator is not going to overlook the candidate from Nebraska, is he?

Mr. HEFLIN. The distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]? I do not know yet on just what ticket he will run. If the Republican Party is controlled by the special interests, it may be that he will not submit to a nomination made at Kansas City.

Mr. President, there is one question here on which Democrats and Republicans alike ought to stand together, and that is the third-term proposition. That means much to our people and much to free institutions in America. The anti-third-term tradition ought never to be broken. There ought not to be any hesitancy whatever on the part of the Senate when that question is raised. We ought to go on record quickly and unanimously in favor of standing by the two-term custom.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I recognize the Senator as a very regular member of the Democratic Party. May I inquire whether he is not opposed to a second term for a President under the present four-year limitation?

Mr. HEFLIN. No. I am in favor of the present plan. I am in favor of two terms carried on regularly and orderly, but when a President dies and a Vice President succeeds to his place and serves as President Coolidge did and then is reelected for a full term, if then he should run again he would violate the custom and it ought not to be.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I put the question to the Senator, remembering as I do full well the platform of the Democratic Party which was adopted in 1912. The Democratic Party then adopted a platform declaring its opposition to a second term.

Mr. HEFLIN. But I think they provided for a six-year term.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. They provided for one term.

Mr. HEFLIN. And then making the candidate ineligible. I personally would rather have two four-year terms. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator will realize that this morning we are not discussing the Democratic candidate but the Republican candidate.

Mr. HEFLIN. I understand that, but, Mr. President, the metropolitan press seems to be determined to nominate Mr. Hoover for the Republicans and Mr. Smith for the Democrats.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. Discussing the Republican candidate is purely an academic question, while discussing the Democratic candidate is a matter of reality.

Mr. BINGHAM. It certainly seemed real the other day on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that the newspapers, the metropolitan press, by their Republican correspondents are going through the South and going about in the West, are trying to make the public believe how popular and strong Governor Smith is for the Democratic nomination. He is nothing like so strong as he was on the 1st of January. He is strong only in the columns of the newspapers. One can get with a group anywhere and ask them about the Democratic situation. Now and then one will tell you Al Smith will be nominated. If you ask him if he is for him, he will tell you no. If you ask him if he knows anybody that is for him, he will tell you no. If you ask him, "Well, how did you get the impression that he would be nominated?" he says, "I get it from the newspapers."

Mr. President, the metropolitan newspapers are carrying exactly what they are told to carry. They are seeking to pick out a nominee for the Democrats whom they think will be easily defeated; and they have certainly hit on the right candidate when they have selected Governor Smith to be the standard bearer of the Democratic Party. [Laughter.]

I do not intend that these Republican correspondents shall go through the South and the West manufacturing political medicine for the Democratic Party. Who authorized these Republican agents to go out and represent the great party of Jefferson and Wilson? They go down through South Carolina and North Carolina and Alabama, where newspapers are changing hands over night, where the Al Smith slush fund is being made manifest on every hand, and they come out and tell us what is going to happen, that Smith is growing, that he is gaining in strength. Mr. President, he is not gaining strength. He is not going to carry any delegates from the South; unless he shall carry some delegates in the State of Louisiana. With that exception, I do not expect to see him get a single vote from a single Southern State.

Mr. President, while I am on my feet I desire to say that by using the "boycott" and other means of coercion and intimidation, the Roman Catholic political machine has muzzled a large portion of the press of the country and made it impossible to get important truths to the American people. When that machine is caught doing things that are harmful to American ideals and institutions you will strive in vain to get these newspapers to publish them. So the press that we once boasted was free is now being muzzled and shackled by this dangerous, antagonistic, and intolerant power. Shall we fold our arms and quietly submit to its dangerous, un-American demands, or shall we insist that the press of this country shall be indeed and in truth a free press to publish the truth and the whole truth about matters that affect the welfare and preservation of this American Government? I care not whether that truth affects Protestants, Catholics, or Jews, the people whose Government this is are entitled to know the truth. The Master said, "Know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

If you want to know the newspapers that are owned in the open or in secret or partly owned or controlled by this dangerous Roman Catholic political machine, see the list of the newspapers in the United States that have recently attacked, misrepresented, and slandered me because I told the truth in the Senate about the reprehensible and un-American activities of the Roman Catholic political machine. At the crack of the whip of their master they all yelped in unison in Alabama and elsewhere. Pigs, when you pour the swill in the trough in front of them, never responded more quickly and unanimously with their grateful squeals than did this pack of unprincipled and cowardly newspapers respond with their bartered attacks upon me when the whip cracked and the coin clinked in their ears. They trampled their honor, if they had any, under foot. They betrayed their country at the behest of a political machine whose coin was the moving cause and whose inspiriting power comes from Rome.

Did Senators observe from these recent outbursts of newspapers how well or generally they have placed them in the various States of the Union? They have gone into nearly every State and established newspapers or bought newspapers, or an interest in newspapers, as I am sure they have done in my State, for the purpose of putting out of business newspapers they could not control and for the purpose of keeping the truth from the people, and they are now controlling and operating newspapers that used to be against Al Smith and all that he represents, but they are now supporting him and fighting the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Having gained control of a large portion of the press, this Roman Catholic political machine has now directed its newspapers to attack free speech in this body. These Romanized newspapers are urging the suppression of free speech in the Senate. They are complaining that the Presiding Officer does not hold that I can not discuss in the Senate of the United States the very dangerous and pernicious activities of the Roman Catholic political machine. They also suggest that the Democratic Senators should forget their Democracy and Americanism and trample under foot the Constitution of the United States and demand that I be silenced in the interest of and at the behest of the Roman Catholic political machine.

But that is not all. The so-called Democratic chairman of the State committee of Massachusetts telegraphed Senator ROBINSON to read me out of the Democratic Party because he, a Romanist, did not like what I have said about the political machine that he belongs to in the East. Then later on 13 members of the Massachusetts Legislature, members of this Roman Catholic political machine, calling themselves Democrats, telegraphed the Governor of Alabama demanding that he call the legislature in extra session for the purpose of having the Democratic members read me out of the Democratic Party.

And then, going from bad to worse and adding insult to insolence, they call on the Democrats here in the Senate, and Democrats everywhere, to read me out of the Democratic Party because they do not want the people to know the truths that I am telling about their program and purpose, and threaten that if they fail to read me out of the party they—the so-called Democrats of Massachusetts—will not send delegates to the Democratic National Convention at Houston, declaring as their reason that they put the interest of the Roman Catholic political machine above the Democratic Party.

But that is not all. A secret fraternal order of Roman Catholics, with headquarters at Chicago, has through its chief officer, one Thomas H. Cannon, written letters to Senators asking them to vote to expel me from the Senate. He would have this done because I have dared to tell the Senate of some of the dangerous doings of the Roman Catholic political machine.

Mr. President, was there ever such a colossal example of unmitigated gall and idiotic asininity found in one group of beings that walk on two feet? Senators, do you want the reckless, intolerant, and tyrannical members of this machine to get control of this Government?

Mr. President, free speech is perhaps the brightest jewel that sparkles in the diadem of liberty; and here in the Senate of the United States it shines as it does in no other law-making body under the sun. And yet agents of the Roman Catholic political machine have been bold and brazen enough to call on Democratic Senators to read me out of the Democratic Party, and they have demanded that Senators vote to expel me from the Senate of the United States because I uttered truths in the Senate that they did not want the American people to know. They were willing to prevent free speech in the Senate, and destroy the rights of the citizen, and tear down constitutional safeguards in order to shield and keep hid the insidious activities of the Roman Catholic political machine. And not a one of the Al Smith controlled newspapers in Alabama has criticized a single agent of this Roman Catholic political machine for seeking to suppress free speech in the Senate or for their insults and insolence to a United States Senator from Alabama.

Mr. President, in a further effort to pursue and punish me, one of the Roman Catholic editorial writers of the New York World not only attacked and misrepresented me but wired to my home town, Lafayette, Ala., and suggested in his telegram to the editor of the Lafayette Sun that he would pay a good price for the right kind of a story regarding me and my standing with the people of my home town in Alabama.

The desire and purpose to influence the sending of a statement harmful to me is clearly seen in the telegram inspired by the agents of the Roman Catholic political machine of New York. I will read the telegram:

CATHOLICS THREATEN US WITH FORCE BILL

On Friday last the Western Union Telegraph Co. delivered to this office a telegram from the New York World, as follows:

"How are Senator HEFLIN'S attacks on Catholics, Smith, ROBINSON, and others regarded by his fellow citizens of Lafayette? Please wire opinions leading men, including your own editorial comment. Will remunerate suitably."

Do you get that expression, Senators? "Will remunerate suitably." Is not that a remarkable telegram? They suggest very plainly to this editor that they are willing to pay a good price for "editorial comment" in keeping with their villainous attacks upon me. Listen to the last words of the telegram: "Will remunerate suitably." In other words, they were conveying the idea that a statement favorable to me would not get much money, but a story unfavorable to me would bring a very substantial check. What they wanted from the people of my home town in Alabama was a story that was unfavorable and harmful to me; and that is what they meant when they said "Will remunerate suitably." But they did not get what they wanted. A telegram sustaining me and commending my course, signed by the mayor, probate judge, and other county officers, bankers, and merchants and ministers of all denominations was sent, which reads as follows:

Leading men of Lafayette and Chambers County thoroughly approve Senator HEFLIN'S stand against involving United States in war with Mexico and South American countries, and indorse his position against Catholic agencies relating thereto. The overwhelming sentiment in this section for prohibition and against Governor Al Smith for President is truly reflected in the position Senator HEFLIN has assumed on the questions in the Senate. Senator HEFLIN'S denunciation of Hearst meets popular approval of Chambers County people. People generally regret Senator ROBINSON'S injecting himself in debate without seeming cause.

Mr. President, if that Al Smith bunch had known that such an answer would come to them, they would never have sent the telegram offering to "remunerate suitably" for editorial comment on my standing at home.

I am calling attention to these things in order to get certain facts in the RECORD, and for the purpose of showing the Senate and the country, by concrete cases and incontrovertible facts, that the agents of this Roman Catholic political machine put the purpose and program of that machine above free speech in the Senate and above the Government of the United States.

Mr. President, Dr. Charles Chiniquy, for many years a Roman Catholic priest, in his book called "Fifty Years in the Church of Rome" tells us that this Roman Catholic political machine plans first to capture and control the large cities of the United States and then get control of the National Government. He quotes the Roman Catholic editor of the Freeman's Journal, the then official organ of the Catholic Bishop of New York, who declared that the time will come in the United States "when not a single Senator or Member of Congress will be chosen if he be not submitted to our holy father, the Pope."

Mr. President, they evidently think that that time has come. The bold and brazen agents of Rome's political machine have invaded the Capitol with their attacks upon me. They sit in yonder press gallery, obeying orders to watch, misrepresent, and slander me. They have attacked free speech in this body and have solemnly called upon American Senators to vote to expel me, a Protestant American Senator, for daring to discuss in the Senate of the United States the iniquitous and un-American activities of the Roman Catholic political machine. They have said by that that their plans and purposes—it makes no difference how despicable and dangerous they may be—shall not be discussed in the Senate of the United States. They would have us cowardly assume in silence the position that if the Roman machine wants war with Mexico, the Senate will do its bidding and declare for such a war. Not if I can prevent it, Mr. President!

I repeat, the agents of the Roman Catholic political machine of the State of Massachusetts have invaded my own State of Alabama with their impudent and insolent attacks upon me. They have declared political war upon me in the State where I was born, where the people have twice elected me to come here and in their name defend our country against all enemies, both foreign and domestic, and the Union and Times, of Buffalo, N. Y., official mouthpiece of the Roman Catholic hierarchy, has declared its intention to have me defeated for reelection to the Senate in 1930.

And this is the political machine that is now doing everything in its power to put Al Smith, the nullifier and wet Tammanyite, in the White House!

PRESIDENTIAL TERMS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 128) submitted by Mr. LA FOLLETTE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Connecticut to refer the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, as this resolution will come to a vote, and I am very averse to any misconception of the motives by which I shall be influenced in voting for it, I feel that it is incumbent upon me to say a few words in relation to it.

The resolution is just a little like a wasp; that is to say, its sting is in its tail. It is obviously not so much the purpose of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to reaffirm the time-honored, third-term tradition as to embarrass the President of the United States and his friends should he be brought up at any time by his party, willingly or unwillingly, as a candidate for another presidential term.

I hasten to say, therefore, that I am out of sympathay with the last clause of the resolution, which resolves that the Senate commends observance of the third-term precedent established by Washington and other Presidents by the present President of the United States; and this notwithstanding the fact that I do approve and do indorse with the full force of any moral or intellectual power that I may possess the first portion of the resolution, which reaffirms the ancient, the patriotic, the beneficent, as I see it, American third-term presidential tradition.

I am bound to say that I was not altogether satisfied by the protestations of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] that the present President of the United States has abandoned all idea of being a candidate to succeed himself. It seemed to me, with due respect to the Senator from Massachusetts, that he left the door just a little ajar, so that if the opportune moment should come the President might find his way back through it to a different position from that which he has recently taken about being a candidate again. It seems to me that the Senator from Massachusetts, in his observations, justified, at least, a slight suspicion upon my part that the present President of the United States is still held by the Republican Party in reserve as a sort of gun behind the door, not expected necessarily to be used, but convenient to be used should there be any occasion to use it, for Presidential purposes.

Whatever may be the disposition of his friends, though a Democrat, I am not willing to put President Coolidge in that position.

I think, as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] said, that the language of the President when he first addressed himself to the subject of a third term was more ambiguous than it should have been. I think it would have been wise for him to have translated what he said from Vermontese into English; for I for one confess that I did not understand exactly what he meant when he declared that he did not "choose" to be a candidate for the office of President. But I am told by persons who are much more familiar than I am with the peculiarities of the New England vernacular—and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] will correct me if I am wrong—that when a Vermonter says that he does not "choose" to do a thing, he is stating positively that he will not do it.

However that may be, only a few weeks ago President Coolidge declared to the Republican National Committee, in what I conceive to be plain, clear language, that the Republican Party must look about for another candidate for the Presidency than himself. Of course, even then he did not use such absolutely unconditional language as that used by ex-Secretary Hughes, when he affirmed that not only was he not seeking the nomination to the Presidency but that he would decline it if tendered to him. Secretary Hughes, however, is one of those individuals who uses the English language with such a degree of lucid and nervous precision as few men are able to do.

I say in all sincerity that I take the President at his word. I believe that he is too honorable a man, I believe that he is too upright a man, I believe that he is too frank and candid a man, deliberately to attempt to create the deceitful impression throughout the country, for a time at least, that he does not intend under any circumstances to be a candidate for the Presidency when all the time there is lurking in his heart the thought that in some contingency or other he may become a candidate.

Until I am disabused of my present impression, I shall believe that President Coolidge, in declining to be a candidate for a third term, has been actuated by the same honorable, patriotic, old-fashioned scruples by which Washington was actuated, by which Jefferson was actuated, by which Madison was actuated, by which Monroe was actuated, by which Andrew Jackson was actuated, when they voluntarily indicated their unwillingness to become a candidate for a third term.

I do not hesitate to say that should the President be weak enough, after having taken the position that he has taken with reference to a third presidential term, to allow his name to be used as the Republican candidate for the Presidency, he would be far from having the high standing with posterity that he would otherwise have.

I will be just enough to him to believe that he has burned his bridges behind him and has cut himself off from every pathway of retreat and that the Republican Party must look elsewhere than to him for a candidate for the Presidency at its next convention.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. From the number of Republicans who are offering themselves, they are not going to have to travel very far to find a candidate, are they?

Mr. BRUCE. With a few exceptions, I do not think that they can find anybody who would be quite as well qualified, perhaps, for the nomination as President Coolidge.

Mr. CARAWAY. I did not say a good candidate, or a successful candidate, but I said "a candidate."

Mr. BRUCE. It seems to me one could hardly throw a stone nowadays without hitting a Republican candidate for the Presidency.

Mr. CARAWAY. I would like to throw the stone.

Mr. BRUCE. The Bible says, "He that is without sin, let him cast the first stone." Perhaps my friend, the Senator from Arkansas is sinless enough to be able to do that; though I am not prepared to commit myself irrevocably to that proposition.

I merely wish to reassert, as an American citizen, my belief in the value—I almost said the sanctity—of this third-term tradition. Mr. President, you may well judge of the intensity of my own feelings in relation to it when I tell you that I would not vote for any Democratic candidate for a presidential third term though he were a Thomas Jefferson, though he were an Andrew Jackson, though he were a Grover Cleveland, though he were a Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Maryland is a great historian, and I want to ask him if it is his opinion that it was on account of Washington's desire not to establish a precedent against a third term that he retired at the time he did?

Mr. BRUCE. That was the impression of his contemporaries, because about the time of his retirement Congress said:

> We can not be unmindful that your moderation and magnanimity, twice displayed by retiring from your exalted stations, afford examples no less rare and instructive than valuable to a republic.

So his contemporaries felt that the real motive to be assigned to Washington's declination to be a candidate for the Presidency again was the belief upon his part that he could not accept a third election to the presidential office without jeopardy to the liberties of his people.

Mr. BORAH. It is a fact, though, that Washington never at any time, so far as I have been able to ascertain, referred to the acceptance of a third term as being inimical to the liberties or sound political principles of our Government. He based his retirement entirely upon the proposition, so far as I can recall, that political conditions at the end of his second term were such that he thought he could retire without failing in his public duty; and, secondly, on account of his personal desire to be out of public life.

Mr. BRUCE. I think that the latter motive must have had not a little to do with his decision, because, as we all know, there was nothing that Washington loved quite so much as Mount Vernon, unless it was American liberty. Of course, it is true that at one time he took occasion to say that he was not fully in accord with Jefferson's views with respect to a third term. But, all the same, as I have said, when he later declined a third term, the significance that was attached to that action by his contemporaries, especially the Members of Congress, was that he was recognizing the dangers that lurked in the lack of the proper degree of rotation in high executive posts.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if it will not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. BRUCE. Not at all.

Mr. BORAH. I have always felt that the third-term proposition as a principle was established by Jefferson. Jefferson was from the beginning opposed to a third term on principle.

Mr. BRUCE. He was.

Mr. BORAH. And he was the first President to state, on his retirement, that it was on account of principle that he refused to accept a third term.

Mr. BRUCE. I think it is true that he was the first President who gave a distinct utterance to the third-term prejudice.

Mr. BORAH. Jefferson, it is true, cited the fact that Washington had retired as a proper precedent to be followed; but Washington did not base his retirement on the ground that he thought a third term was wrong in principle. He said, in effect, that had the political conditions been the same at the end of his first term that they were at the end of his second term he would have consulted his own personal pleasure and retired then.

Mr. BRUCE. I am not saying that Washington ever made any specific declaration of any kind with reference to the third-term idea.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator will remember that Washington voted in the Constitutional Convention against the proposal to limit the term to seven years and make the President ineligible for reelection.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator's memory on that is no doubt much clearer than mine.

Mr. FESS. The Senator referred a while ago to a statement of President Washington. That appeared in his letter to La Fayette.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes.

Mr. FESS. In that he distinctly denied the wisdom of making the President ineligible.

Mr. BRUCE. I would not put it that way. He distinctly indicated that at that time he was not fully in accord with the views of Jefferson on the subject.

Mr. FESS. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BRUCE. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Is it not true that Jefferson declared against a second term, as well as Madison and Monroe and Jackson, each one declaring for a single term?

Mr. BRUCE. No; that is absolutely not the case, as I recall. The last utterance of Mr. Jefferson on the subject—I think I happen to have it before me—was what he said in his autobiography:

> The example of four Presidents voluntarily retiring at the end of their eighth year, and the progress of public opinion that the principle is salutary, have given it, in practice, the form of precedent and usage, insomuch that should a President consent to be a candidate for a third election I trust he would be rejected on this demonstration of ambitious views.

Mr. FESS. The Senator will recall that that statement was made in 1826, the very year that Mr. Jefferson died.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I am referring to preceding statements on the question of limiting Presidents to one term. Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe had taken that view, historically.

Mr. BRUCE. That is not my recollection of the matter. In his autobiography Jefferson also used these words in speaking of the continuance of the President in office:

> That this continuance should be restrained to seven years was the opinion of the convention at an earlier stage of its session, when it voted that term by a majority of 8 against 2, and by a simple majority that he [the President] should be ineligible a second time. This opinion was confirmed by the House so late as July 26, referred to the Committee of Detail, reported favorably by them, and changed to the present form by final vote on the last day but one of their session. Of this change three States expressed their disapprobation—New York by recommending an amendment that the President should not be eligible a third time and Virginia and North Carolina that he should not be capable of serving more than 8 in any term of 16 years.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Ohio if it is not true that when Jefferson and Monroe and Madison declared for a single term it was in connection with the fact that the term should be seven years?

Mr. FESS. No.

Mr. BORAH. I do not recall that they ever declared for a single four-year term.

Mr. BRUCE. I certainly do not.

Mr. FESS. All the men I have mentioned, including Jackson, have made official statements against reelection, against the subject of eligibility to reelection.

Mr. BRUCE. Let me call the attention of the Senator from Ohio also to the language in a letter to the Legislature of Vermont, if I am not mistaken, in which Jefferson declared that he should be "unwilling to be the person who, disregarding the sound precedent set by an illustrious predecessor, should furnish the first example of prolongation beyond the second term of office."

Mr. FESS. That was the year before his second term closed.

Mr. BRUCE. I do not think that any profit is to be gained, with due respect to the Senator, by running the present colloquy out, because I do not think that he will find anywhere a declaration on the part of Mr. Jefferson in favor of a single term, unless, as the Senator from Idaho suggested, that term were prolonged beyond the duration of four years.

Mr. FESS. I shall take the time, when the opportunity offers, to give the historical statements and point out just when those statements were made by these men. I have made a study of this question and I am not talking from impressions. I am talking from the documents. All the men I have mentioned were against reelection. That was fundamental.

Mr. BRUCE. All the language which I have quoted is, of course, inconsistent with the impression which the Senator from Ohio entertains. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. BORAH. It is certainly true that Madison, Monroe, and Jackson all proceeded by their acts to disavow their declarations to which the Senator from Ohio refers.

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. BRUCE. So far as Andrew Jackson is concerned, the Senator from Wisconsin failed to mention the fact that he suggested, certainly once, a constitutional amendment limiting the reeligibility of the President.

Mr. FESS. And the Senator will recall that President Cleveland in his first inaugural came out in favor of limiting to one term, and yet he accepted a second election.

Mr. BRUCE. I do not know anything that is really so—I will not say melancholy, because that is too strong a word—but so well calculated to stimulate reflection as the human weakness that has been shown by some of the great men who have filled the presidential office when the lure of a third term was held out to them. Wilson, of course, in more respects than one yielded to the natural impulse to prolong his official life. Roosevelt most conspicuously did so. After declaring that there was no distinction of substance to be taken between a President elected twice by the people and a President who was Vice President in the first instance and then became President, he actually afterwards became a candidate for the Presidency. From reading the last biography of Cleveland I am satisfied that if the call had come to him very strongly to be a candidate for a third term he would have been a candidate. That is, as I have said, human weakness. That is but the love of fame, which has been called "that last infirmity of noble minds."

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. The Senator, I think, ought to say that in the case of Woodrow Wilson there was no inconsistency. While he was elected on a platform containing a declaration for one term, he never committed himself to it that I know of, and never mentioned it afterwards.

Mr. BRUCE. I do not know but that a man commits himself at least to a certain degree by standing on a party platform and taking his chances on it at a national election and being elected. That is a very nice question of political ethics.

Mr. FESS. It is generally known that President Wilson never agreed to that language. I do not mention him in connection with any inconsistency. He was not inconsistent. But I think it is true in Cleveland's case and in Jackson's case, and in the cases of Monroe, Madison, and Jefferson. In all those cases it is true, but not in the case of Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. BRUCE. The only Presidents that we have had who were firm enough to wave aside the crown when it was offered to them upon the Lupercal were Washington and Jefferson.

Mr. FESS. And he did it not because of the test of three terms, but upon personal reasons.

Mr. BORAH. Jefferson did not do it for personal reasons. He pointedly rested his refusal to accept a third time on the ground of principle, on the claim that a third term was perilous to republican government.

Mr. BRUCE. In other words, Jefferson thought that if a President was elected a third time it would be easy for his third term to run into a fourth, and still easier for his fourth term to run into a fifth, and still easier for his fifth term to run into a sixth. In other words, he said, to use his own graphic language, for nobody ever used words more vividly than did Mr. Jefferson, that where a President is continued in his exalted office, term after term, there is danger of his tenure "sliding into an inheritance."

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Idaho referred to Jefferson. The Senator from Maryland referred to Washington. That is the only difference.

Mr. BRUCE. Oh, no; I said Jefferson also. Of course, Mr. Jefferson, as the Senator from Idaho so well reminded us, planted himself upon the rock of principle, of irrefragable principle.

Mr. FESS. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. BRUCE. Perhaps so.

Mr. FESS. I would not want to be understood as saying that Jefferson put it aside on personal grounds. I thought the Senator said Washington.

Mr. BRUCE. No; I said both. I think it is fair to infer that the declination of Washington, too, was influenced by the belief that a third term was a thing unfriendly to the perpetuation of American liberty.

Mr. FESS. There is no dispute of that fact.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

Mr. BRUCE. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. I could gather nothing else from reading Washington's declination of the office, that he put it upon the higher ground of his country's interest. The whole tenor of his speech was that. I certainly think it would be attributing to him motives that can not be found in the text to say that he put it upon the ground that it was inexpedient.

Mr. BRUCE. I should not have limited my statement that only two Presidents have really declined a third term, to Washington and Jefferson, because for all practical purposes Andrew Jackson, too, did decline one. It is my belief, also, that if the tender of a third term had been actually made to Madison or Monroe they would have been impelled by the example of Jefferson, their political chief and devoted personal friend, if by nothing else, to reject the tender. My statement was too sweeping.

Mr. BORAH. Is it not true that Washington at one time declared that he was not in favor of limiting the number of terms which a President might occupy the chair?

Mr. BRUCE. I think so. But, as I recollect, that was not very long after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and in the meantime the third-time prejudice was growing and waxing stronger and stronger, as Washington himself must have realized. Later it was to become little less than part of the Federal Constitution.

In my judgment there is nothing in the idea that there is any solid distinction to be drawn between a President who becomes Vice President and then, under the provisions of the Constitution, has the office of President devolve upon him and is afterwards elected as President, and a President who has been twice elected by the people.

Something has been said in this discussion about the possibility of a Vice President not becoming President until a very short time before the expiration of the term of the President with whom he is associated, but on the other hand it must be recollected that it is an entirely possible thing for the Vice President to become President a very short time, even one day, after the election of the President himself. The Senator from Idaho or the Senator from Ohio will correct me if I am wrong, but I think it was only a month or so after his inauguration that President William Henry Harrison died.

Mr. FESS. One month.

Mr. BRUCE. So it is possible for the Vice President to become President in a very brief period after the President is inaugurated, and to fill out, for all practical purposes, the entire term of four years as President.

Mr. CARAWAY. It is not a question of the length of time he serves. It is the number of times he takes the oath of office.

Mr. BRUCE. It is the danger that lurks in keeping the same man in a high executive post like that year after year and the opportunities which are afforded him in such a post of building up with official patronage and other public favors a powerful organization of friends and adherents whose fortunes depend largely upon the perpetuation of their chief in office.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Would the Senator's view be carried to the extent that in case the President died on the 3d of March, just one day before his term ended, and the Vice President was inaugurated as the President for one day, that the principle would still hold good?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; because a President might die on the 5th of March immediately after the day on which he is inaugurated.

Mr. FESS. In other words, the Senator thinks that the people of the country should be denied the privilege of voting for a man except for one term provided that he had one day more than one term.

Mr. BRUCE. I do, because we must have a general rule. Who knows anything that is final about the laws that govern human mortality? The President might die immediately after his inauguration as well as on the day before he goes out of office, so we must have a general rule applicable to all cases.

Mr. BORAH. The question of the Senator from Ohio is to the effect that the people would be denied the right to vote for a man because he had had one extra day. The people are not denied the opportunity because this is not a constitutional provision. I have always been of the opinion that it is perfectly safe to leave this matter with the judgment of the people.

For instance, I have always felt that if Lincoln's first term had been a second term and I had been living I would have voted for Lincoln for a third term. There are exigencies and extraordinary conditions which might justify that, but it is one of the things that, under the precedents and traditions of the country, we can leave to the sound judgment of the American electorate, and the chances are that under those circumstances no man will ever be President a third time even if he were nominated.

Mr. BRUCE. That may be.

Mr. FESS. If that is the view of the Senator, I agree with him.

Mr. BRUCE. Circumstances wholly extraordinary might arise in the course of our history under which the services of some one individual might become indispensable. That is imaginable, but after all that is such a comparatively remote contingency that it does not break the force of my argument to admit its distant possibility.

Mr. FESS. If that is the view of the Senator, I quite agree with him that it could be left to the people to do what they choose to do; but I suppose, while we have not that provision in the Constitution, we are proposing to pass a resolution to that effect. If the resolution does not have the effect of law, what is the use of passing it?

Mr. BRUCE. So far as I am concerned I am willing to give it the force of law, absolutely inviolable law. In other words, I wish very much that it was in the Constitution, but I would have it in a little different form. What I should like to see—and I imagine possibly what the Senator from Idaho would like to see—would be a provision in the Constitution that the President was to be elected for seven years, say, and then was to be ineligible for all time thereafter.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have always been opposed to that theory, but I am frank to say that I am disposed to change my mind. At least I have a more open mind. I am not so sure but that I would be willing, notwithstanding some views I have heretofore expressed, to support a constitutional amendment providing for a seven-year or six-year presidential term, the President not to be reeligible. I think possibly that would be the best way to dispose of the matter.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] speaks about the adoption of this resolution having the force and effect of law. Of course, the Senator from Ohio knows that it would not have the force and effect of law. It would be simply an expression of this body and the other body that would help to mold public opinion and strengthen and buttress the anti-third-term tradition and more thoroughly establish it as a tradition in the political life of the American people; but it would not have the effect of law, even though the Senate should adopt it and the House of Representatives also should adopt it.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator from Idaho knows, though, that the strength of——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield to me?

Mr. BRUCE. I will yield in just one moment. The Senator from Idaho knows, of course, that the strength of a people consists often as much in the respect that they have for custom, usage, and tradition as for written law. Indeed, there is often something more powerful about the sanction of a tradition than about the sanction of a law. A law may or may not be in harmony with public opinion, but a tradition can only live and be respected ex proprio vigore, of its own vigor, independent of constitutional or statutory law. Now I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I merely wish to say in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] that the passage of a resolution similar to the one now pending by the House of Representatives had a very salutary effect at the time when Grant was considering being a candidate for a third term.

Mr. BRUCE. Indeed it had. That resolution was passed under circumstances which demonstrated more powerfully than anything in our entire political history how deeply embedded in the profoundest convictions of the American people is the anti-third-term tradition.

There we had as a candidate for the Presidency General Grant, a military hero, a man who had done, perhaps, more than any other individual in the United States, except Abraham Lincoln, to preserve the Union, a man around whose honored head respect, admiration, and affection clustered; and yet, notwithstanding the strenuous efforts made to nominate him for a third term, and the leadership in the movement to nominate him of a man of commanding political genius—Roscoe Conkling—the attempt to nominate him completely miscarried. The American people were not willing that even General Grant, military hero as he was, should be President of the United States for a third term.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield to me?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The resolution mentioned by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] was adopted in 1875.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; that is true. I spoke of the Springer resolution. I was really thinking of 1880. But in 1875, as the Senator from Wisconsin suggests, there was that Springer resolution, which was adopted by the House of Representatives by a vote, as I remember, of 251 to 18, declaring that the third-term tradition was for all practical purposes a part of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield for a correction there?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes.

Mr. FESS. That resolution was offered by Mr. Springer, of Illinois, at a time when the Republican Party was divided into two factions; in fact, the opposition to General Grant was so strong at the end of his first term that the Liberal Republican Party was created. That opposition, of course, was joined in by the Democrats, and ultimately, as the Senator will recall, in 1872 Horace Greeley was nominated on the Liberal Republican ticket by the faction which broke away from the old Republican Party. It was upon that occasion that the Democrats in convention indorsed the Liberal Republican candidate.

Mr. BRUCE. Of course——

Mr. FESS. Will the Senator from Maryland yield further?

Mr. BRUCE. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. The factions were so bitter against General Grant that it not only lead to a split in the party and a third organization with a presidential ticket in the field, but it left him without any considerable support either in the House of Representatives or in the Senate. It was then, in 1875, that Springer offered the resolution, and 164 Democrats, every Democratic Member of the House, voted for it, and all the Republicans but 18 voted for it, representing the antagonism to General Grant's administration. So there was no possibility of General Grant at that time being favorably considered for a renomination.

Mr. BRUCE. But how about the situation in 1880, when he offered himself as a candidate for a third term?

Mr. FESS. The situation then was entirely different. That was when Roscoe Conkling espoused his cause, as the Senator has narrated.

Mr. BRUCE. Of course, I am not saying that in 1875 the situation was not complicated to some extent by factional considerations and was not shaped to some degree by factional influences; but the real compelling thing that led to the adoption of that resolution was this salutary, as I see it, apprehension that the American people have always entertained of a third term. That that was true was shown by the failure of General Grant only five years later to be nominated for a third term, because of the refusal of the majority of the members of a Republican National Convention to nominate him.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The reason why I referred to the Springer resolution was because the Senator from Ohio a moment ago made the suggestion that the adoption of the pending resolution would have no effect. There are historians—although they may not, in the opinion of the Senator from Ohio, be as able or as well informed as he—who maintain that the passage of the Springer resolution was the very thing which put the quietus upon the Grant boom.

Mr. BRUCE. That is very likely. The Senator from Ohio will be interested when I tell him something in connection with the convention at which General Grant sought a third term. Some time ago I received a letter from one of General Grant's sons, Mr. Ulysses S. Grant, of California, and a most interesting and delightful letter it was, referring to the aspirations of his father to be President of the United States for a third time. To give an idea how general, how potent, the opposition to a third term was at that time, Mr. Grant wrote me that he himself was so strongly prepossessed against a third term that he endeavored to induce his father not to be a candidate for one.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further? Then I will not interrupt him any more.

Mr. BRUCE. Certainly. I am nearly through.

Mr. FESS. In matters of history I regard the Senator from Maryland as one of the most accurate Senators that grace this body, and when he speaks upon a matter of history I always listen.

Mr. BRUCE. I will say to the Senator, do not listen to me too confidently——

Mr. FESS. I do.

Mr. BRUCE. Because the Senator knows that, while there is such a thing as impromptu eloquence, there is no such thing as impromptu history.

Mr. FESS. No; but the Senator always makes a difference between history and imagination, though most people do not. What I want to ask the Senator is this: In view of the divided condition of the Republican Party at the end of the second term of General Grant, with the Liberal Republican Party having broken off and conducting a campaign against Grant, does the Senator believe that there was any possibility or likelihood of General Grant becoming a candidate for a third term; and does he believe that the Springer resolution had anything whatever to do with it?

Mr. BRUCE. To be perfectly honest with the Senator, I do not believe that under any circumstances in the past, in the present, or in the future, it has ever been, or is, or ever will it be possible for any man to become President of the United States for a third term.

The Senator knows, because I happened, at the request of the New York Times, to write a paper for that journal last summer on the subject of the third term, and the Senator from Ohio was asked to reply to it. What a tremendous broadside was on the point of being poured out by the press of this country against a third term for President Coolidge when it was arrested by the announcement of the President that he did not choose to be a candidate again for the presidential office! I was told at that time that even the Springfield Republican, which is an organ very close to the President, was opposed to the President being a candidate to succeed himself, and that when the President came out with his announcement no fewer than 13 of the leading Republican newspapers of this country friendly to the President had declared their disapproval of his renomination. I have heard those things from reliable sources, though I have never had an opportunity fully to verify them. The truth, I believe, is that a storm of the very greatest magnitude was brewing when the President made his announcement. There was every indication that the latent hostility to a third term which exists in the breasts of the American people was about to be fully aroused, and to assert itself as it has never failed sooner or later to assert itself when provoked.

I have already said that I do not think that the President harbors any idea of being a candidate, but it is my view that if he were to be a candidate, if he were not defeated on any other ground he would be defeated because he was a candidate for a third term.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit another interruption?

Mr. BRUCE. Take me, for instance. I am nothing but an ordinary Democratic voter; but, as I have already said, I would not vote for any Democrat whatsoever for a third term, and if I have heard one I have heard many Democrats say the same thing. And I have heard Republicans say the same thing, too. One of the most prominent Republican Senators on this floor said to me to-day—there is no occasion for mentioning his name—that under no circumstances could he be induced to vote for any candidate for President who was seeking the Presidency for a third time.

Suppose General Grant had been elected President of the United States for a third time, and suppose that the country had then found itself involved in some widespread communistic or socialistic agitation, or caught up in the vortex of some sort of revolutionary movement; how easy would it have been for him to have passed from a third term to a fourth term; and then, as the sense of public insecurity became lulled to sleep more and more, to have passed to a fifth term, and perhaps to a life tenure.

Another thing: It is not only "the man on horseback" that needs to be dreaded in connection with this third-term tradition. There is the comparatively ordinary, commonplace, civilian President who is subservient, without being grossly subservient, to the great moneyed interests of the United States. Take him for an illustration. How easy would it be for him, with the aid of the vast material influences of this country when alarmed by social unrest and dissatisfaction, to be continued from term to term as readily as some soldier President, when the barriers of the third-term tradition were once thrown down.

No; Mr. Jefferson was right. Let a President have a third term, and let that be succeeded by a fourth term, and that by a fifth term, and that President may well slide into an inheritance, to use Jefferson's phrase. People would become accustomed to the idea of continuity of tenure in the presidential office. Popular jealousy and vigilance might become dormant, and it is true now as always that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." Even under our American institutions we might have some situation like that which was developed in France when the great Napoleon became First Consul, and then, a little later, on the strength of his First Consulship, became the Emperor of France; or like that which was developed in France when the lesser Napoleon became President of France, and then, a little later, on the strength of his Presidency, became the Emperor of France.

The idea that we need not now maintain the same safeguards and muniments for the protection of our liberties that we have always maintained in the past will not stand examination. All human history moves in cycles. The problems of fifty or a hundred years ago are constantly coming in one form or another to the surface of human events again; and, if anything, it is more dangerous to continue a President now indefinitely in the presidential office than it was in the earlier history of our country, because influences that are particularly alive to the meaning of governmental stability and material prosperity are far more potent to-day than they were in the first stages of our national life.

There is also a secondary reason why this third-term tradition should be preserved inviolate, and it is this:

Benjamin Franklin once said that every old woman is a good woman. We know that this is not true of men, because some of the vilest and wickedest men that we have ever known were old men; but Franklin believed it to be true of old women. So it may be said that every President is a good President during his second term, when there is no prospect of his acquiring a third term. It is during the second terms of our Presidents that the people of the United States have obtained all sorts of reforms—valuable, permanent reforms—that they were unable to obtain during their first terms.

Almost all the great extensions, for instance, of our civil-service system, which I regard as on the whole the most admirable feature of our entire political administration, were willed to us, so to speak, by our more recent Presidents on their presidential deathbeds. When a President is no longer solicited by the fears and hopes of his first term, having dismissed from his thoughts the idea of again being elected to the Presidency, his chief object then is to stand well with posterity. He need watch the play of political intrigues and vicissitudes no longer. He knows that his name is about to pass down in history, either to be disparaged and belittled or to be glorified and beloved. A President must be a poor creature indeed who, during his second term, is not eager to leave to posterity some lasting, perpetual pledge of his regard for the higher interests of the American people.

But to elect a President to a third term and then to a fourth term and then to a fifth term, and the set of motives leading a President of the United States to take such high ground in a public sense during his second term, that I have described, will be lost to our system of civil polity.

But I have addressed myself to the pending resolution at entirely too great length. I will now merely repeat that while, for the reasons which I have given, I can not approve the concluding clause of this resolution, the rest of the resolution meets with my hearty, unreserved approval.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, we listened this morning to a very able argument by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on his resolution. We also heard him say that he would like to secure an immediate vote on the resolution, although it had not been considered before to-day.

I have moved that the resolution be referred to the Judiciary Committee. It seems to me that the Senate has one or two bad habits. Perhaps it ill becomes me, as one of the junior Members, to speak of such a thing; but, having come from civil life more recently than most of the Members of the body, perhaps I have heard more criticism of our manners and customs here than they have.

To the general public, and I may say also to the historian, a Senate resolution is usually of just as great importance as a concurrent resolution or a joint resolution or a bill. The public does not know how these measures are considered. The historian, in looking back, sees that the Senate has passed a Senate resolution, and reads the resolution, and takes it for granted that that is the embodiment of the mature consideration of this body. The public, when a Senate resolution is passed, usually takes it for granted that that is an expression of mature opinion.

Most students of politics know that ours is a committee form of government. Almost any school boy who has studied American history and American political science and the ways and manners and customs of our great Republic knows that this is a committee form of government.

When such a small matter as the nomination of a postmaster comes here it is referred to a committee for consideration. The least important bill is referred to a committee for consideration. Joint resolutions are nearly always referred to committees. By the peculiarity of the rules of the Senate, a Senate resolution lies on the table for one day, under protest, and then is considered in the Senate.

The supposition on which those rules are based, I take it, is that a Senate resolution is not a matter of very great importance, and therefore it does not need to receive that careful consideration among a few Senators chosen for the purpose of considering it that happens in the case of a bill sent to a committee.

And yet the Senator from Wisconsin objects to this resolution being referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, presided over by the able Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], because he says that that would be a kind of lethal chamber where it would be chloroformed. I did not know that the Senator from Nebraska was accustomed to practice chloroforming in his committee. My observation of his activities have not led me to make any such supposition. But the Senator from Wisconsin thinks that the Senate ought, without careful consideration by a committee, to proceed to the passage of this resolution. By inference this resolution is a matter of so little importance, less than the appointment of a postmaster, that it does not need to be referred to a committee.

Now, Mr. President, it does not seem to me that this resolution is of little importance. On the other hand, it seems to me to be a matter of great importance—almost as important as an amendment to the Constitution. It might be said to lay down a definite policy.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] has recently referred to a resolution passed in the House in 1875, referring to the question of a third term for General Grant, as being a matter which was of very great importance and great influence at that time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. When Mr. Springer introduced that resolution in the House there was a frantic effort made on the part of those who were opposed to the resolution to adjourn the House in order to secure time, in the hope that they would be able to prevent and defer action upon the resolution. However, those who supported the resolution, having studied it, and understanding its simple terms, prevented that action being taken.

Mr. BINGHAM. In other words, I understand that when that resolution passed the House it was rushed through without the same amount of attention being given it that is ordinarily given to measures which pass the Houses of Congress.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It was not given as much consideration as an appropriation bill or some other matter which requires a lot of debate. It was simply an expression of the sense of the Members of the House; and they were of sufficient intelligence to read the resolution, and decide whether or not it expressed their conviction, and to vote accordingly.

Mr. BINGHAM. I get the inference, of course; but it does not seem to me that the Senate always looks at a bill that is introduced to see whether it is so simple that the Members of this body are of sufficient intelligence to understand it immediately and therefore to pass it without reference to committees. It is usually only local bills—a bridge bill or something of that kind—for which there is great necessity, some local necessity, not a matter of general public interest, that is rushed through this body without being carefully considered in committee.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE and Mr. LA FOLLETTE addressed the Chair.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield first to the Senator from California. Then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. May I make this observation, trusting that some gentleman will consider it? I respectfully submit that neither the House nor the Senate has any constitutional authority to entertain or to pass this or like resolutions. This is a legislative body.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the Senator. Now, I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I merely wish to say—and I do not desire to interrupt further the speech of the Senator—that I submit the proposition that this resolution is not being jammed through the Senate. The Senator well knows that I have no desire to cut off any debate that may be desired to be had upon the resolution. Furthermore, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut, although he may not remember it, to the fact that a resolution very similar to this was introduced by me on the 22d day of last February, and was caught in the filibuster at the close of the session, and did not receive consideration; and the present resolution has been before the Senate for some time.

Mr. BINGHAM. Was the Senator's former resolution referred to a committee?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It was not, Mr. President, as is the case with most of these resolutions.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is just the practice to which I am objecting, and about which I am trying to say a few words, the practice of introducing a Senate resolution, which then goes to the table, and stays there until its author can call it from the table. In the great press of business, with the large number of bills that come before us, and the amount of committee work each Senator must do, it is practically impossible for a Senator to read all the resolutions which are on the table and know exactly what they contain. I knew in a general way that this resolution was on the table. I had not had an opportunity to read it until this morning, and the same applies to other Senators.

As I said before, if it is a matter of great importance it ought to go to a committee, as all other matters of great importance should do. The fact that it is not desired to have it go to a committee would seem to imply that it is not a matter of great importance. It has been suggested that it is merely a gesture, a political gesture. It is introduced by the representative of a State that has not been friendly to the present administration. Without making any personal reference, I well remember in the last Republican National Convention at Cleveland sitting just behind the delegation from Wisconsin, and when the name of the President of the United States was first mentioned in that convention, and the delegates from all the other States stood up and cheered, the delegates from the State of Wisconsin did not stand up, but sat in their seats, plainly showing their disapproval of the President of the United States.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, Mr. President; and those delegates are very proud of the record they made at that convention.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am glad the Senator remembers the circumstance. The delegates from that State are proud of their record in showing their disapproval of the President of the United States, who was then nominated and elected by the largest majority ever given to any presidential candidate in this country.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. In just a moment. It is also significant that this resolution was then favored by the genial and distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], who has never been noted for his warm advocacy of the present occupant of the White House nor of the party which he represents. Therefore, Mr. President, it seems to me a perfectly logical conclusion to draw from this coincidence that this resolution, which can not be a matter of great importance, since its introducer does not desire it to go to a committee, is a gesture, an unfriendly gesture, against the present occupant of the White House.

Now I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the Senator has stated that President Coolidge was reelected, or elected, by the greatest majority ever given a presidential candidate in the history of the country. I want to call his attention to the fact that in his calculation he leaves out the 5,000,000 votes which were cast for La Follette, and when you count those votes against him his majority was not large; it was small, in fact. It was about 2,000,000, instead of 7,000,000, as the Senator's reference would make one believe. That is not a large majority, with the women voting.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, my recollection is that at some time during the past summer the Senator from Wisconsin announced that he was going to reintroduce this resolution, which, as he says, was on the table during the last weeks of the last Congress. He did not introduce it, however, at the beginning of the session, although I fully expected him to do so from what I had read of his intention in the papers when I was out of the country. My recollection is that it was not introduced until a certain newspaper published in this city published a poll taken through its constituents all over this country, a poll representing a large number of people, chiefly country people, in nearly all of the States of the Union, a poll that showed presidential possibilites, both Republican and Democratic, and which further showed that it was the overwhelming wish of the people who took the trouble to cast their votes in this newspaper poll that Calvin Coolidge should be the candidate of the Republican Party in the next election. My recollection is that in that poll the President received as many votes as all other Republican nominees or candidates put together.

That was a poll which aroused considerable interest throughout the country, and some talk, and it was very shortly after that, and possibly due to that, that this resolution was introduced by way of preventing anything like a snowball from growing in favor of the present occupant of the White House receiving the nomination at Kansas City.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator did not compare the President to a snowball, did he?

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator is always able to draw his own conclusions from anything anyone says.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator mentioned the President and a snowball, and I did not know which one he was indorsing.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am sorry my vocabulary is so defective. Seriously, Mr. President, it seems to me that the resolution is not a matter of light importance. It is a matter of very great importance, and as a matter of great importance it ought to go to the Judiciary Committee and be passed upon. If it passes the Senate—and I understand there are votes enough to pass it—it will go down through time as an expression of formal opinion of the Senate of the United States on a matter of great public interest.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has injected into this debate a new idea, or at least it is the first I have heard of it; and I must admit I have not been in the Chamber all during the Senator's remarks. I want to ask him whether he is laboring under the belief that this resolution is intended as a criticism or is intended in any way as a reflection upon President Coolidge?

Mr. BINGHAM. That is the general opinion, Mr. President, not alone of myself but of a number of other people. In passing let me mention the fact that its chief advocates are persons who have been markedly opposed to the President from the beginning. This lends color to that general belief.

Mr. NORRIS. I notice that the resolution itself extends a vote of thanks to President Coolidge for having joined the ranks of those who are opposed to a third term. I have no idea that it is intended as any reflection upon President Coolidge.

Mr. FESS. What is the significance of the second resolution?

Mr. NORRIS. It is a sort of vote of thanks to President Coolidge for having failed to choose. If we strike out everything else, I presume the Senator from Connecticut will support the resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator from Nebraska has been one of the most cordial supporters of the President of the United States in everything that he has done?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. And therefore I have no doubt that his interpretation of it must be correct, and that it is really a vote of thanks to the President!

Mr. NORRIS. It does not follow from the fact that I have been such a cordial supporter of the President, taken at a hundred per cent, that I could better interpret a resolution than could the Senator from Connecticut, who has always been pulling the President down, saying derogatory things about him, trying to embarrass him here in the Senate, and opposing his policies, and so forth and so on.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I suggest that the reporters insert "sarcasm" after that.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not suppose that criticizing the President had anything to do with our ability to construe a resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I suppose I may take it for granted that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] is a supporter of the President.

Mr. NORRIS. I was surprised that the Senator in his wisdom should think that the resolution was intended to cast any reflection upon the President of the United States.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask if the Senator from Connecticut remarked that I was a supporter of President Coolidge?

Mr. BINGHAM. For fear lest the printed word might be misunderstood by those who can not see the expressions on our faces, I will say that I never have accused the Senator from Arkansas seriously of supporting the President of the United States, although he favors this resolution.

Mr. CARAWAY. From what does the Senator draw that conclusion?

Mr. BINGHAM. From a remark I just heard the Senator address to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CARAWAY. The only thing I said was that the only person I knew of who was supporting the President for a third term was the Senator from Ohio, in opposition to his own colleague, and it filled me with grief that that got out. I was trying to confine that to the Senator from Indiana and myself. But now that is out.

Mr. WATSON. I did not believe it.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator winked at me, and everybody knew that he concurred in what I said.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, with the Senator's permission, in the interest of posterity, I respectfully suggest that the reporter be authorized to insert at this point of the proceedings that much that has been said by the amiable Senator and aspiring President from Nebraska, and by the Senator from Connecticut be set down as sarcasm, so that history, when she comes to look lovingly upon this episode, may understand that they were not speaking seriously, although seriously sarcastically.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, at this point I should like to have the clerk at the desk read a very interesting editorial from the oldest daily newspaper in the United States, which is published at Hartford, Conn., the Hartford Courant. It concerns this resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Hartford Courant, Thursday morning, February 2, 1928]

SENATE AND THIRD-TERM PRECEDENT

If Senator LA FOLLETTE is against allowing a President to serve for more than two terms, the thing for him to do is to introduce a resolution to submit to the States for ratification or rejection a constitutional amendment forbidding the President to serve more than six years, eight years, or whatever period the Senator has in mind. We do not believe that Congress would or should adopt such a resolution, and we do not believe that the States would or should accept such an amendment. There would, however, be point and force in a resolution of this sort. There is neither point nor force in Senator LA FOLLETTE'S resolution, which would declare it to be the sense of the Senate that departure from the two-term precedent would be "unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions."

Such a resolution, if adopted, would have no force as law and no influence on public opinion. Possibly it could be forced through the Senate as a purely partisan measure, but no shrewd person would take it for anything else than a partisan measure and an empty time-wasting gesture.

The omission from the Constitution of a limitation on the number of terms a President may serve is not accidental. It is conceivable that circumstances might arise which would make it highly advisable that a President continue in office for more than two terms. Nor need these circumstances necessarily be of a drastic nature. The electorate might choose, and properly choose, to reward with a third term an exceptional President who had given them an exceptionally satisfactory administration. It would be unwise to create obstacles to prevent them from doing so. "Reeligibility of the President," wrote Hamilton in the Federalist, "is necessary to enable the people, when they see reason to approve of his conduct, to continue him in the station, in order to prolong the utility of his talents and virtues, and to secure to the Government the advantage of permanency in a wise system of administration."

We suspect that Senator LA FOLLETTE neglects to sponsor a resolution submitting an antithird term amendment to the States because he knows that such a resolution and such an amendment would be contrary to public sentiment and would fail. But if public sentiment is hostile to such a resolution and such an amendment, why should the Senate waste time and fly in the face of public sentiment by expressing on this question an opinion that, in view of the present political complexion of the upper House, would have no value whatsoever?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I submit that this resolution is in the nature of a political gesture, put forth by the enemies and opponents of the present occupant of the White House, and put forth to make it impossible or difficult for the Republican Party to nominate him if they see fit or to elect him either at this or any other time, either in the year 1928 or in the year 1932.

I submit that this is too important a measure to pass the Senate under the influence of personal feeling and partisan prejudice, and that, therefore, it should go to the Judiciary Committee where it will not be chloroformed but will receive such able consideration as amendments to the Constitution receive at the hands of that committee.

It seems to me that the resolution in its present form is extremely unwise. In the first paragraph it reads that it is the sense of the Senate—that any departure from this time-honored custom of not reelecting a President who has had two terms "would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions."

Surely no one can believe that a time might not come, as in the middle of the great World War, when we might come to the end of the second term of a President, and it might be absolutely necessary for the life of the Republic that that President be reelected. I am sure that had Woodrow Wilson's term come to an end in the middle of the war, while we were still at war, he would have been reelected without any question. To say that any departure from this custom would be "unwise and unpatriotic and fraught with peril to our free institutions" is to overlook the possibility that such an event might happen in the middle of a great war.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator referred to President Wilson and the World War. Just prior to that he said in effect, as I remember it, that if in the midst of a great war the President's term of office should expire, the very life of the Republic might depend upon the reelection of that President. I will admit that that would be a reason for the reelection of a President if his conduct of the war had been satisfactory. I can not conceive, however, that it would be as serious as the Senator puts it, and I want to ask if the Senator believes, if President Wilson's office had expired during the middle of the war, that the life of our country would have depended upon his reelection as President?

Mr. BINGHAM. By the Constitution the President of the United States is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. While it is possible to carry on a battle if the commander in charge of that battle is killed, the Senator will know, from his study of history, that such an event usually causes the loss of the battle. When the Commander in Chief is taken away at a critical moment it frequently results disastrously. Furthermore, we have an old and homely adage in New England that one should not swap horses while crossing a stream.

Mr. NORRIS. If that be true, if the Senator has diagnosed the case correctly, then in the middle of the war if Woodrow Wilson should have died our country would have gone to pieces because the entire Army and Navy were without a commander. Does not the Senator know, or will he not admit, that while the President of the United States is, under the Constitution, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, that immediately upon his death the Constitution provides for somebody else to take the reins of office, and that it is also true that while the President is technically the Commander of the Army and Navy, nobody expects him to go out on the field of battle and command them. He remains in Washington, and the commander who really commands the Army and who has charge of the Army in the battle field is selected by the President, and that he would not be disarmed or his office would not be taken away from him even though the President should die right in the midst of a battle.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the Senator from Nebraska think that if Abraham Lincoln had died in 1863 or in the middle of the War between the States the outcome would have been the same, or that the cause of the Union would not have been placed in great jeopardy?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think that the cause of the Union would have failed. It would have been a wonderful catastrophe, I admit that—something that nobody would want to happen. But the fact of a President dying or his term of office expiring in the midst of a war does not demonstrate, and it does not follow from that—and this is the point I wanted to call to the attention of the Senator—that the life of the country is dependent upon it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Perhaps not the very life, but the prosperity of the country and the success of its enterprise. I think no one will deny that if Abraham Lincoln should have died in the middle of the War between the States it would have been a calamity of the very first order.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it would.

Mr. BINGHAM. And it might have jeopardized the Union cause. It is impossible to say what would have happened had the then Vice President come into the office. It seems to me that some provision should be made in this resolution whereby, when the country is in a state of great emergency, as in the midst of a great war, we might reelect the President who is carrying on that war successfully.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. I think I can see the direction in which the mind of the Senator from Nebraska is drifting; that is to say, if the Senator from Connecticut were to say that the election came in the midst of the war, as in the case of Woodrow Wilson, and that his defeat would endanger the war, whether or not the Senator from Connecticut would have voted for Wilson's reelection.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not get the full drift of the Senator's statement.

Mr. WATSON. I was suggesting that evidently the Senator from Nebraska was inducing the Senator from Connecticut to say if Woodrow Wilson's term had expired in the midst of the Great War and the success of the war had depended on his reelection, whether or not the Senator from Connecticut would have voted for Woodrow Wilson's reelection.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Connecticut would have done that, of course. That follows as a matter of course. The Senator from Connecticut has just stated that if the term of the President expired during the war, it mean destruction of the country. Of course, we do not want to say that the Senator from Connecticut wants to destroy the country. He is loyal, of course. However we may disagree with him in some of his conclusions, we are not going to charge him with disloyalty.

Mr. WATSON. I am very glad my friend from Nebraska has answered that question for the Senator from Connecticut without his intervention.

Mr. NORRIS. There is only one answer that can be given, from what the Senator has said.

Mr. WATSON. I do not think the illustration used by my friend from Connecticut, who is always so apt in his choice of language, is quite fit and appropriate. That is to say, the fact is that Woodrow Wilson was repudiated by the people themselves before the close of the war when they elected a Republican Congress, but the war went on to its close. But there might come a condition far more stringent, far more exigent, than the case to which my friend has referred. There might come a condition where the reelection of a President might be absolutely essential to the preservation of the life of the Nation.

Mr. NORRIS. It might be.

Mr. WATSON. It never has yet occurred.

Mr. NORRIS. We can imagine such a condition. For instance, it might happen that the President might die, the Vice President might die, and all the leading Republicans in the Senate might die, and the country would go to smash. There would not be anybody to take his place. There would not be anybody to legislate.

Mr. WATSON. Oh, the Democrats would be here! [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. We might even go further and say it is possible that an earthquake should take place and kill 90 per cent of the Senators and Members of the House all in the twinkling of an eye. We would not have any Government left. That would be a serious thing.

Mr. WATSON. There would be a great uprising of candidates.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It might be highly beneficial to the country.

Mr. NORRIS. It might be hard on us, and good for the country. I would like to call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to the fact that, as I understand his position to be, we would have to have an amendment to the Constitution which would provide that in the case of war or other great danger, if the term of the office of the President by the Constitution expired, he should be automatically continued in office until the war was over. I do not see any other way out, because we can imagine, no matter what kind of a Constitution we have or how great the President may be, a condition that would bring destruction and disaster to the whole country, if not to the civilized world.

Mr. WATSON. Then why legislate on a proposition of this kind as against a catastrophe that might occur?

Mr. NORRIS. The reason why we legislate on anything is on the theory that the things that are going to happen, in the imagination of people who are always afraid that something extraordinary and unnatural might happen, never do happen and never will happen.

Mr. WATSON. On the other hand, if my friend will permit me, no man ever yet has been nominated for the Presidency for a third term. That may never happen.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is a sentiment which ought to be continued and developed and permitted to grow, that that should not occur in the future. I am surprised that anybody's position on the pending resolution at this time should be ascribed to his love or his dislike of President Coolidge. I do not claim to be very great or to have a very bright mind, but I would be ashamed of myself if I were so narrow that I could not consider a resolution of this kind without being moved by my dislike or my love for anybody, whether he be President or not. I am surprised that it should be charged to anybody that his support or his position, and there are grounds for being on either side, should be on the narrow ground of his like or dislike of any person, or whether he is favorable or unfavorable to a third term for President Coolidge. That might have been charged when the resolution was introduced before, but now I do not see how it has anything to do with it. I was delighted that it was to come up at a time when I supposed there would not be any such prejudice injected into the discussion.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator will realize that it was introduced just after a popular expression of opinion in favor of the President serving again.

Mr. NORRIS. I had in mind also that it was introduced after the President had reaffirmed his statement that he would not be a candidate. The fact that a Senator is standing in his place now making an argument here, as I understand the argument, on the ground almost entirely that it will do away with the possibility of President Coolidge being nominated for a third term, if we pass this resolution, is what I can not understand.

Mr. BINGHAM. Surely the Senator will not contend that that is not its object.

Mr. NORRIS. No; so far as I am concerned, that is not its object. It is a great deal broader than that.

Mr. BINGHAM. What is its object?

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator wants me to tell it in his time——

Mr. BINGHAM. I will yield the floor to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I shall be delighted to explain the object as I understand it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the Senator tell us at the same time why he objects to the resolution being referred to his committee?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. If I should forget to do that, will the Senator call my attention to it, and I will follow it up. I have not anything to conceal, so far as I am concerned, in connection with the pending resolution. I may be entirely wrong about every idea I have, but I am not ashamed of any that I have. I am ready to tell them, and I am ready to answer any question that I can answer that anybody wants to submit to me. I will do my best.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, before the Senator commences, will he call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to the fact that the very language against which he now protests received the vote of every Member of the House from New England when it was introduced in 1875?

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that to be true. If I am wrong about that, I should like to have the Senator from Wisconsin correct me.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that is substantially correct, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. Not only the language was the same, but every Member of the House of Representatives from New England voted for it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, in this connection, may I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that that resolution was jammed through without being properly considered by a committee? My chief objection to the procedure in which the Senate is now engaged is that it is an effort to go ahead and do something of great importance on the spur of the moment without having it receive that consideration in committee which is given to practically every measure that comes before this body, be it great or small.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

Mr. CARAWAY. I presume that the Senator is attributing to the New Englanders who voted for the resolution in 1875 lack of information that they could have acquired if they had had another week or two to study the language?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is certainly ascribing to the New England Representatives——

Mr. CARAWAY. Ignorance.

Mr. NORRIS. A failure to take the course they would have taken if they had given proper consideration to that resolution.

Mr. CARAWAY. That they absolutely voted without due information.

Mr. NORRIS. That they did not have the information they ought to have had.

Mr. CARAWAY. I have often thought that was true, but I never had the courage to say it.

Mr. NORRIS. That they would not have voted as they did if the resolution had been referred to a committee.

I started to say, for the benefit of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] mainly, that my reason for supporting this resolution is one that has no partisanship in it and is without regard whatever to any man or to any President. I am not going to be dissuaded from doing my duty as I see it, however erroneous I may be, by the charge that is made sometimes that I am moved by a feeling of animosity toward the President. In the first place, I have no such animosity; I deny that kind of charge. I say here and now that I have not any feeling of unfriendliness toward the President of the United States; I hope I may never have such unfriendly feeling; but, on the other hand, I feel that I am perfectly free and that I am not under the control of the whip or lash of anyone because he happens to be President of the United States. If it were the fact that he was my closest, personal, confidential friend, I would still feel that I should vote on this question, as well as on any other, without regard to his wishes after I had informed myself so that I thought I understood what was the proper course to pursue.

As I look at this resolution, it is important; and, while our action will have no legal effect, it may have some moral effect; it may have some historical effect. It may do some good; I think it will. I may be entirely mistaken about it. Legally it can have no effect whatever. We all admit that. It is important, because, in my judgment, if a President of the United States, should our present partisan political conditions that I am going to speak of in a moment continue, were allowed to renominate himself, as he could, it would mean—not perhaps in my lifetime, or it may not be in the lifetime of anyone here—but it would mean ultimately the establishment in this country of a monarchy upon the ruins of our present republican form of government.

We ought to consider this question in the light of surrounding conditions. I think we should have another change in the Constitution that would take away a great deal of the danger that comes from a reelection two or three times of the same man to the office of President; but at the present time, under our political conditions here, to be President a man must first be nominated by one of the dominating parties.

In theory it is possible to be elected otherwise; as a matter of practice it is an impossibility. So a President wishing to be renominated, if he wants to use the power that is his, after he has been in office for some time, can compel his party—whatever party it may be, either one of the dominating parties—to renominate him. That is almost universally conceded. Again, it is possible that may not be true, but in all probability, taking the doctrine of chances, that is true. He reaches out with his mighty hand into every hamlet, every crossroads, and every post office; every United States marshal, every United States district attorney, all the judges, all the United States officers everywhere are his appointees. Take human nature as it is, and not as we would wish it to be, and everyone of those officials feels somewhat of a personal obligation to the man who gave him his position. If we eliminate all feelings of partisanship, of jealousy, of selfishness, and just take men and women as they are, honest as the bulk of them are, they would feel friendly to the man who gave them their positions. But that is not all, for we must take into consideration the selfishness, the jealousy, and the avarice of political machines. He does not have to be, but if he wants to be the President is at the head of the machine that is in power; he is at the head of the one that has the entire country within its grasp, within its grip, and can through the power that he possesses, using the officials who are under him and who range down to the lowest on the list, round up delegates; he can control conventions as no other man on earth can control them. We know that to be true. If Presidents were nominated at a primary, it would not be so bad, but they are not nominated in that way; they are nominated at national conventions, where the rank and file of the people have practically nothing to say as to what the program shall be. He nominates himself by using the instrumentality that the law gives him on account of his position.

Now, let me use as an illustration the case of President Coolidge. I use it only as an illustration; I go on the theory that he is not a candidate, and hence if I were his bitterest foe I would not be casting any reflection upon him when I make the statement. It seems to me the man who says he is a candidate is practically saying that he is dishonest and deceitful and is trying to deceive the American people. Take him at his word. So I am using his case merely as an illustration.

Before he issued his famous statement that he did not choose to run he was recognized quite generally as being a candidate, as wanting to be renominated and then reelected to the office of President. Nobody else was in the field; everybody conceded that he could nominate himself if he wanted to do so. To begin with, we have an unhealthy condition. The man who is at the head of the political machine in power is recognized by his friends and his foes as being able to renominate himself, and there is no contest over it; there is no competition; there is a trust, there is a monopoly of the nomination as far as his party is concerned. That is always injurious; that is always detrimental to a free government; that always tends toward the abolition of freedom on the part of the citizen and happiness on the part of humanity generally.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. About four-fifths of all governmental positions are now under civil service. Does the Senator think that a President could renominate himself with a great body of people against him and——

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator for that suggestion.

Mr. WATSON. Wait until I put the question.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator for calling my attention to it; I would have forgotten it. I will answer that.

Mr. WATSON. But I have not completed the question.

Mr. NORRIS. I will let the Senator ask another one. I would have forgotten it if he had not called my attention to it, and I am under obligations to him.

Mr. WATSON. I have not finished the question as yet.

Mr. NORRIS. A large number of Government officers and employees are under civil service. Suppose that the first time a President renominates himself it is not necessary, as it would not have been in the case of President Coolidge, to call on the civil-service employees. It would not have been necessary for him to say anything to them; probably in a general way most of them would have been for him because they got their places under his administration. But suppose he has done nothing wrong so far as the civil-service employees are concerned in order to secure the nomination——

(At this point a message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of the clerks.)

Mr. WATSON. The Senator did not permit me to ask my question.

Mr. NORRIS. I caught the Senator's question; I am going to answer that one first.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator did not catch the question, because I never finished it.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I will let the Senator ask me another one afterwards. The Senator must let me run this proceeding. I will permit him to ask me another question as soon as I get through with this one.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator has not permitted me to ask the first one.

Mr. NORRIS. I am going to answer the Senator's question now, and then let him ask me another, and, slow as I may be, I will finally get around to it.

Here are many officials and employees under the civil service; the President for the first time gets a renomination and is reelected, and we have turned the wheel of progress that many points backward when that is done. He has the office; he has tasted power; and it is human nature for the man who has power to use it all and to reach out and get a little more, and if he gets a little more he will stretch that a little bit, and the next time, the fourth time, or the third time; yes, even the second time, the President of the United States can wipe the civil-service provisions off the statute books and put every post office at every crossroads upon the political pie counter. He can do that to-day if he wants to; he has it within his power; and such things are going to happen if we put a monarch in the White House. If we keep on in the direction of having a Mussolini, the time will come when there will be no civil service for anybody; it will be wiped out by an order of the President. That is a danger that is in the immediate future if we keep on in this direction.

If I were cruel, if I were inclined to bring partisanship into this discussion, as I think the Senator from Connecticut believes I am trying to do, and as some Senators seem to think partisanship is involved in it, in the case of a Republican President renominating himself, I would point my finger to the "solid" South, to the organization of the Republican Party down there, which everybody knows is corrupt, which is a disgrace to civilization, which ought to disgrace and does disgrace any administration that continues it in power; yet any Republican President has the power, if he wants to wield it, to line up the "solid" South just as a master can line up his slaves.

Now, I am ready for the next question the Senator from Indiana wishes to ask me.

Mr. WATSON. I have never finished the first one as yet.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well; let the Senator finish it, but I thought he had done so.

Mr. WATSON. In the first place, I disagree entirely with the Senator that a President could mobilize those in office under the civil service. I should think that fully half of them are Democrats right now, and that the President could not mobilize them if he wanted to, because they are opposed to him politically.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, my observation——

Mr. WATSON. Hold on; wait a moment. The Senator has not let me ask my question as yet.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator keeps putting something up and I am going to answer as I go along, because if I do not I will forget it, and I am going to answer that question now. My observation is that the power of a political leader, the power in this case of a President, to mobilize Democrats is just as easily exercised and as great as it is to mobilize Republicans, and we have seen that illustrated right here in the Senate.

We saw, after we got through with a filibuster against the ship subsidy bill, that the lame ducks were rewarded with places at the political trough, given fat jobs and fat salaries; and it applied to Democratic Senators just the same as it did to Republican Senators, although the man who gave them the feed and poured out the soup was a Republican President.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. In a moment. I want to get through with the Senator from Indiana first.

Mr. WATSON. Does my friend mean to say that because of that fact the Senators on the other side of the aisle would have supported him for the nomination for the Presidency?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. WATSON. Certainly not.

Mr. NORRIS. But there are a whole lot of fellows that he gave jobs to who would have done it. They might have been precluded from getting into a Republican primary or a Republican convention; but it is true right now in the South, where, in many instances, the Republican machine is indorsed by Democratic officeholders, and they work with it, and the Republican machine brings that about by giving to some of these Democratic officeholders some pieces of political pie. So when you want to mobilize a lot of fellows you can get plenty of fellows to mobilize in any political party that I have ever known about if you will give them something for mobilizing.

Mr. WATSON. Now, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. I thank the Senator. I want to ask two, asking one at a time.

With half the officers Democratic now, as I undoubtedly think they are, does the Senator believe that President Coolidge could have renominated himself purely by the official force in the United States if the very great body of the Republicans in the United States had been opposed to him? Can a President, by using the official power that he wields and that the Senator says he wields, renominate himself if the great body of his party are against him?

Mr. NORRIS. Now, let me answer that question.

Mr. WATSON. I will.

Mr. NORRIS. Nine times out of ten he can do it. The Senator has coupled with the question the clause "if the great body of the party are against him."

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. It depends upon how great a body of the party that would include. I can conceive of a condition where the great bulk of the party would be against him, where they would get bold enough so that they could say so openly without being charged with being traitors to their country; but that does not happen very often. That did not happen in President Coolidge's administration. I know that men who said they were not in favor of his renomination, said it courteously, said it gentlemanly, were denounced as traitors to the Republican Party because they refused to follow their leader. The trouble is that it is not only the fellows who hold office—and again I thank the Senator for calling my attention to it, because I might have forgotten it—but it is the bulk of the machine, private individuals, private corporations who are making money out of the party, who are in it for other purposes besides holding office, scattered all over the country. If they are satisfied, the unseen government, the political machine, the political bosses, all line up in favor of the man in power, if he is giving them a sufficient amount of the pie to make it profitable for them to be there.

We know that was true. We know, everybody knows, and it was conceded, that President Coolidge could have renominated himself if he had desired to do so and to use the power that was his and under his control; and in my judgment it is to his credit that he refused to be tempted eventually, and did not use it.

Mr. WATSON. I want to ask the Senator a question right there. Does not the Senator believe, though, that President Coolidge was strong enough with the great body of the Republicans of the United States to have been renominated without an appeal to the official force?

Mr. NORRIS. I will answer that by saying that that question is absolutely immaterial and irrelevant.

Mr. WATSON. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. NORRIS. It has not anything to do with the question at issue.

Mr. WATSON. Yes, it has.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose President Coolidge is a saint. Suppose he is all that some of those think who follow him when they think he is going to be renominated and reelected—the most powerful person on earth, one who could not do any wrong, one who is perfect. Suppose all that; still, that is no argument why this resolution should not be adopted, and that is no argument why we should not prevent, if we can, Presidents from being reelected to a third term.

So I say it is absolutely beside the question to say that President Coolidge was sufficiently popular that he could have gone in without using anything that was unfair. For the sake of argument, let us admit that to be true. I do not believe it is, but I am going to admit it for argument's sake. So much more ought we to say that we will not establish a precedent here that is going to come home to plague our children when we are gone.

Read Washington's Farewell Address, where he tells us about the danger of a precedent. The first time wrong is done and the precedent established, it may be done by a good man with the best of intentions; but the precedent is established, and in future years that precedent will be used by the demagogue and the rascal to perform his tricks and to fool the people.

Mr. WATSON. I come now to the final question I want to ask the Senator, which is what I believe is the logical conclusion of the other questions I have been asking, namely:

The Senator, then, denies that the great body of the American people should have the right to elect a President a third time in this Government of the people, even if they want to do so?

Mr. NORRIS. No, Mr. President. It would not always follow that the President would be elected. If we did not have any such thing as an electoral college, if we did not have political machines that control nominations, and if there were some practical way for anybody to run independently for President of the United States and have a square, honest fight before the people, I would not care whether this resolution went up or down; but it is the conditions that exist that make me think that it is important that we should pass it.

When we let a Republican or a Democrat, either one, control the nomination and nominate a man as President, we have then taken away from the rank and file of the party or of the people the right to make that nomination. We have taken away the right of self-government, which in theory we give to these people, all of whom are supposed to have an equal voice in the nominating of their candidate; and when another candidate on another ticket, the ticket of the only other party, is controlled by a political machine, and then the election comes, the people do not have a square deal. They do not have an opportunity to vote their sentiments. They are confronted with a proposition where they must choose what in their judgment is the lesser of two evils.

The right of self-government to that extent has been denied to them. They have been euchred out of it by the political machine; and although they might rise up in their might, although in theory it could be done, under our present way of doing business and carrying on our political things here, with the existence of the Electoral College, it is a practical impossibility for them to do it. Hence the danger of the control, by the means I have enumerated, of one of the dominant parties of our country. Even though we say that the other party may then come into power and at the election elect its candidates, it nevertheless has taken away from millions of honest, patriotic citizens the right to participate in the selection of a candidate of their choice, of their party, representing ideas supposedly at least with which they agree, and they are compelled to vote for the candidates of another party, representing an entirely different idea of government; and hence they are, in effect, disfranchised.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Would not the Senator's argument against the President having the power to renominate himself apply to the second term just as well?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I admit that it would, but I will not admit that it would apply with the same effect. The principle would be exactly the same; I admit that; and if I had my way, Mr. President, if I could fix the Constitution as I wanted to, I would fix it so that the President of the United States should have only one term—I might make it longer; I would not quarrel whether it was six, or eight years, even—and disqualify him. But it is true that at the end of the first term, in theory, the same conditions exist. The only difference is that the longer he stays in, the longer he remains in the office, the greater that power is, the more rapidly it accumulates, and the more reason there is why he should use it for selfish purposes.

Mr. FESS. Would the Senator's argument lead to the conclusion that the practice we have of renominating a President for a second term has grown up through undue influence on the part of the President?

Mr. NORRIS. It has often been true, I think, that there has been very great influence used. I think that is true.

Mr. FESS. It has come to be rather the custom to give a President a second term.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it has come to be rather the custom to give him a second term.

Mr. FESS. Then, if the Senator will permit a further interruption, there are a few cases where a President was a candidate for renomination in which he was defeated.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESS. In the cases of Polk, Pierce—Buchanan was not a candidate—Tyler, Andrew Johnson, and Arthur, all of whom were Presidents, although they had come to the Presidency from the Vice Presidency, they were all candidates for reelection, and all of them were denied the nomination.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I think what the Senator says has considerable force. I admit that, although I would not want to be understood as saying that I thought a President has in any way distorted or prostituted his power by forcing his renomination.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the Senator now referring to President Coolidge? I have not charged that.

Mr. FESS. No; I am referring to the general practice of Presidents.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes.

Mr. FESS. As to the resolution we are now discussing, I do not know that I would decline to vote, as an expression of opinion, that the country should not recognize the third term. I have felt, though, from the beginning, that the objection to a third term would not apply to a case where it is a second elective term. In other words, if a man had been President only a week, and then was reelected, that ought not to be counted as a second term.

Mr. NORRIS. I think we ought to consider this as reasonable men. If the man had been President a week, for instance, I should not like to call that a term. If he had been President longer than that, there might come a place where it would be difficult to draw a line. I concede that.

If we had a condition where a President had been in office just a week before he was elected to a term, and then was seeking reelection, I would not consider it very bad grace or unpatriotic to support him for renomination. I think that to a great extent the opposition would fade away, because he would have served so short a period during the first term.

Mr. FESS. I do not think the Senator and I differ widely, if he takes that position.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not think we do. I can conceive also of conditions under which I would be in favor of the election of a President for a third term. I do not know whether such a time will ever come, but it may. The reason, as I said in the beginning, is not all on one side of this proposition, and while I admit that there might come a time, if we had in our Constitution a provision against a third term, when I might regret that it was there, for the time being, on the other hand, I am willing to yield to that extent in order to do away with what I believe to be the greater danger that will come if we establish this kind of a precedent.

It is difficult for me to imagine that, if a President were carrying on a war, as the Senator from Connecticut has suggested, the American people would not be wise enough to elect a successor who would represent their ideas in prosecuting the war. I do not believe there is any great danger in that regard. I do not believe that there will ever come a time, if that happens, when the American people will select a President who is not willing, if they want it done, to carry on the war to its conclusion. Those things would all be fought out in the campaign, and the planks in the platforms would make all those things clear. So, I think the danger is very much overestimated.

Have I forgotten anything the Senator from Connecticut wanted me to answer?

Mr. BINGHAM. I had hoped that before the Senator got through he would tell us why he did not want this matter to go to his committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; I said I would make a statement in regard to that, and I will do so.

That is a question with two sides to it, but to me it is perfectly plain that this resolution should not go to a committee, principally because it represents an idea upon which all of us have definite convictions. It is not anything new. It is not a long resolution, and there is no doubt about the language. No one has expressed a doubt as to anything it contains. It expresses an idea. We are either for or against the principle of a third term for any President of the United States.

Mr. BINGHAM. No, Mr. President; I can not agree with the Senator in that statement.

Mr. NORRIS. What is wrong about that statement?

Mr. BINGHAM. The way in which the resolution is worded might be changed. I am not in favor of three consecutive terms, or four, or five, or six, as the Senator has imagined. On the other hand, the resolution, as it reads, would place the Senate on record as stating that even in case of great emergency a President might not be reelected for a third term. It would place the Senate on record as stating that if a President had had two terms and had gone out of office for four years he could not at some future time be reelected.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think so. I do not get that idea from the resolution and from the remarks that passed back and forth between the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Ohio, I think it was. I did not get that idea.

Mr. BINGHAM. Why could not the resolution be changed in committee so as to preclude that very idea?

Mr. NORRIS. It might be.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, exactly this resolution, in this exact form, was the resolution voted on in General Grant's time, and every Member of the House and Senate, I understand, from New England, including Connecticut, voted for it exactly as it now stands.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, that statement is not correct. I was just looking up the RECORD, and I want to ask unanimous consent that the part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for December 15, 1875, which contains the entire matter—it is very short, because there was no debate on it at all, the previous question being moved—may be inserted in the RECORD. The roll call shows that the vote of the 18 who ventured to vote against it came from all over the country—1 from Illinois, 2 from Michigan, 1 from Vermont, 1 from Alabama, 2 from South Carolina, 1 from North Carolina, 1 from Mississippi, 2 from New York, 1 from Louisiana, 1 each from California, Maine, Pennsylvania, Florida, Missouri, and Kentucky.

Mr. NORRIS. What was the number from Maine?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Blaine was absent. There was one from Maine who voted against it; and there were several from Massachusetts, Maine, and Connecticut who were absent, so that there was no sectionalism about it, and the statement that all the New England delegation voted in favor of it is not correct, for of the 18, 2 voted against it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BINGHAM. Has the Senator any objection to me having this extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of 1875 printed in the RECORD?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have none.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to that. I will be glad to have it printed.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 15, 1875, 44th Cong., 1st sess., vol. 4, pt. 1, p. 228]

PRESIDENTIAL TERM

Mr. SPRINGER. I offer the following resolution, upon which I move the previous question:

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents of the United States, in retiring from the presidential office after their second term, has become, by universal concurrence, a part of our republican system of government, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions."

The question was put upon seconding the previous question; and on a division there were—ayes 144, noes 2.

So the previous question was seconded. The main question was then ordered to be put, being upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CLYMER. Upon the question of the adoption of the resolution I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MacDougall moved that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the House refused to adjourn.

The question was taken on the resolution offered by Mr. Springer; and there were—yeas 233, nays 18, not voting 38; as follows:

Yeas: Messrs. Adams, Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., John H. Baker, William H. Before the reading of the roll call,

Mr. Beebe called for the reading of Rule XXXI.

The rule was read, as follows:

Every Member who shall be in the House when the question is put shall give his vote, unless the House shall excuse him. All motions to excuse a Member from voting shall be made before the House divides or before the call of the yeas and nays is commenced; and the question shall then be taken without debate.

Mr. BEEBE. It was my purpose to insist upon the enforcement of the rule just read. I will not do so, however, for the reason that I think we have had a sufficient declaration of the sentiments of this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Cox). Debate is not in order. There is no way of enforcing that rule, as was sufficiently tested at the last session of Congress.

Mr. HOAR. I ask that the reading of the names on the roll be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That requires unanimous consent.

Objection was made, and the roll call was read, as above recorded.

Accordingly the resolution was adopted.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will not the Senator permit me to give some figures with regard to New England?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There were 28 Members in the House at that time from New England, and that roll call shows 4 of those 28 absent, 1 from Maine, 1 from Vermont, 1 from Massachusetts, and 1 from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is correct.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There were 22 of the 24 who were present who voted for the resolution, and 2 voted against it.

Mr. NORRIS. Now I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Was the resolution adopted applicable to General Grant's time identical in form with the resolution now proposed?

Mr. BINGHAM. The first part of it was identical. Will the Senator give me permission to read it?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. The resolution was offered by Mr. Springer. The RECORD states:

Mr. SPRINGER. I offer the following resolution, upon which I move the previous question.

There was no debate.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the House, the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents of the United States, in retiring from the presidential office after their second term, has become, by universal concurrence, a part of our republican system of government, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions.

There was no second paragraph.

Mr. NORRIS. As far as the Senator has read it, it is identical, I understand, with the pending resolution.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, Mr. President, that is the exact language of the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. A copy of it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Answering further the Senator's proposition, it seems clear to me that here is a proposition we could well vote on, even without debate. Of course, the Senate may think otherwise and send the resolution to the committee, and if it does the committee will give it careful consideration and do the best it can with it. There is only one idea in it, only one, whether we want to express the sentiment of the Senate as being opposed to a third term for a President of the United States, or a President to succeed himself with a third term.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator is touching on a point now about which I have been thinking since this debate began. This resolution seeks to get the sense of the Senate. If we refer it to the Judiciary Committee, how are the committee to get the sense of the Senate in reference to our attitude on the question whether a man having been sworn in twice as President should be sworn in a third time?

Mr. NORRIS. There is only one way that I know of by which the Judiciary Committee could get the sense of the Senate, and that would be to report the resolution back to the Senate and let the Senate vote on it.

Mr. SMITH. Or call in each Senator and get an expression of his opinion.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. I do not see that there is any ground whatever for sending it to a committee, when it appeals to the sentiment of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, of course one object of referring it to the committee might be to prevent the Senate from expressing its opinion on the subject.

Mr. SMITH. I thought perhaps that would be the expression of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BINGHAM. That never could happen with a resolution sent to the committee of the Senator from Nebraska, however. That was why I moved that this resolution be referred to his committee, so that there might not be any suggestion that I was trying to defeat the resolution. My idea was merely to see that it was put in the proper language, which I am sure that committee would do.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit me to suggest that the Judiciary Committee of the Senate and the Judiciary Committee of the House are bodies to advise upon legal questions which may be submitted to them, legal questions touching laws and statutes which are upon the statute books, or proposed laws, and also the construction of constitutional questions?

The Judiciary Committee is a committee of lawyers. The question involved in this resolution is one of policy. The Constitution does not limit the term or indicate in any way that a President of the United States should have but one or two terms or any number of terms. Therefore there is no question to submit to the Judiciary Committee.

As a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, if this resolution should come to that committee I would be absolutely helpless to express the opinion of the Senate. As has been said, we would have to report the resolution back to the Senate or bring the Members of the Senate one by one or in groups before the committee to have them express to the committee orally their views upon a question that is not a legal question.

For these reasons, if the Senator will pardon me for interrupting him, I am opposed to having this resolution referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Let us take the sense of the Senate upon it. There is no legal question involved.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the passage of this resolution, however, might advise the Judiciary Committee as to the attitude of the Senate on a constitutional amendment looking to a prohibition of a President's continuation in office.

Mr. NORRIS. That might be. As far as I am concerned, I am willing to support that kind of an amendment to the Constitution. But my experience with amendments to the Constitution in the last four or five years is such that I would not want to have more than one or two of them on my hands at a time.

Unless the Senator from Connecticut conceives of some other question he wants to ask me about referring the resolution to the committee, I have but a word more to say. I believe there is nothing to be gained by referring this resolution to a committee. I consider that it is a proper parliamentary procedure, if the Senate desires to take it, and I have no criticism to make in regard to it, but here is a simple resolution covering one idea. We all have definite opinions on that idea, and it will not be necessary for us to have the advice of a committee in order to enable us to vote.

It seems to me, therefore, that we ought to vote either for or against this resolution, vote it either up or down while it is here, and not waste the time either of the Senate or of the committee by referring it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I will delay the Senate but a moment. I would like, first of all, to reply to the suggestion made by the Senator from Connecticut that I introduced this resolution following the result of some poll which had been taken. Such is not the case. At the time I introduced this resolution I made a statement, which was published in the press, and I desire to have that statement printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, Jr., authorizes publication of the following statement:

The action of the New York State Republican leaders on Saturday, January 28, in agreeing upon an uninstructed Republican delegation that will be first for President Coolidge, is conclusive proof that the movement to "draft President Coolidge" and smash the third-term tradition is gaining headway.

Charles D. Hilles, vice chairman of the National Republican Committee, and former chairman, is responsible for the action taken at Albany on Saturday. He has persistently advocated that the Republican Party should not take seriously the statement that "President Coolidge does not choose to run." It is reliably reported that Mr. Hilles and Secretary of the Treasury Mellon are working in close cooperation and that a drive is on to obtain uninstructed delegations in many States which will support the plan "to draft the President."

In order that the representatives of the people in the Senate may have an opportunity to express their conviction with regard to the importance of preserving the tradition that no President shall succeed himself for a third term, I have introduced a resolution and shall press for its early consideration and adoption by the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Suffice it to say the particular occurrence which prompted me to introduce this resolution was the action taken in New York by the Republicans, under the leadership of Mr. Hilles, in insisting that they were going to revive the movement to draft President Coolidge.

Furthermore, Mr. President, some of the men who were in the House of Representatives at the time the resolution was voted on during General Grant's administration, and who the Senator from Connecticut thinks took snap judgment and were not aware of what they were doing, were Samuel S. Cox, of Ohio; William P. Frye, of Maine; James A. Garfield, of Ohio; Eugene Hale, of Maine; George Frisbie Hoar, of Massachusetts; Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania; John H. Reagan, of Texas; Adlai E. Stevenson, of Illinois; and Henry William Blair, of New Hampshire.

Those are just a few of the distinguished men of the time who were in the House, and who voted for this resolution.

Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut considers this to be merely a political gesture. In so far as I am concerned, I have introduced this resolution because I believe there is grave danger that this third-term tradition may be broken, and I feel that it is the duty of the Senate to go on record in connection with the situation that exists.

I sincerely trust that the motion of the Senator from Connecticut to refer this resolution to a committee will not be agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, just a word in connection with the distinguished names which the Senator from Wisconsin just read. That does not alter the fact that the resolution was jammed through, that when it was introduced the previous question was moved at the same time, and that there was no debate on it whatever.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut suggested that some of us who favor the resolution are doing so because we do not enthuse very much over Mr. Coolidge. I have no personal grudge of any kind against President Coolidge. I like him about as well as I could like any Republican President, I suppose. [Laughter.] We have always gotten along very well personally. Even when he presided over the Senate and made rulings that I did not think were sound and proper, it did not affect our personal relations.

Mr. President, it makes no difference whether we like a President or not, whether we would like to see him reelected or not, our duty to our country is one thing and our partisan preference another. I am actuated in this matter only by what I conceive to be the best interests of my country. I would support the resolution just as cheerfully if we had a Democrat in the White House occupying exactly the same position that Mr. Coolidge occupies. It would not make any difference whatever with me.

I regret to see the able Senator from Connecticut—and he is an able and distinguished Senator—showing his partisan feeling in the matter. I have always feared that the New England Senators had something up their sleeves with regard to Mr. Coolidge not choosing to run. The Senator from Connecticut is about to let the cat out of the bag. He is insisting that we leave this thing alone; let them continue to tie up Republican delegations; let them continue to confuse the political situation and bring in candidate after candidate, until a condition arises where they would have to ask Mr. Coolidge if he would not change his mind and choose to run. They may intend to say, "The President did not seek a third term. He announced that he would not seek the nomination. But the party thrust it on him. He did not wish it at all. He is only responding from a sense of duty when the call has come so overwhelmingly from his party." It seems to me that the Senator has that thought away back in his mind, but he has not told the Senate about it.

But we are going on with war in Nicaragua without authority from the Congress, killing American boys day after day, and God knows how many we have had killed down there. The Senate does not know and the House does not know. Other things have been going on. Manipulation of the money supply of the country in the interest of a favored few, the centralization of power, the concentration of wealth into the hands of a few people. I do not know but that the same people who are so well pleased with what is going on now will demand that Mr. Coolidge be nominated.

Be that as it may, the Senate owes it to itself and to the country to go on record opposing the breaking down of this time-honored custom of our country. The Bible tells us and the Senator from Connecticut "Remove not the ancient landmarks of the fathers." Yet here he is quibbling about a resolution which seeks to give our sanction to a valuable and time-honored custom of our country. But he wants to refer the resolution to a committee. He wants to delay it. He wants to postpone it. What good can be done by postponing it? Let us have action on it. We know whether we, as Senators of sovereign States, want to go on record as favoring a custom established by Washington and maintained by the country from that good day to this.

Why should we defer action on this important matter? Have the political exigencies of the Republican Party come to be of greater concern to the Senator from Connecticut and other Senators than the welfare of our common country? I trust the time will never come with me when I shall put the welfare of the Democratic Party above the welfare of my country. I do not. I think there ought not to be any division here about it. I think the most wholesome thing that could go out from the Capitol would be for all Senators, Democrats and Republicans, to vote together and pass this resolution.

The Senator from Connecticut reminds us that Mr. Coolidge went in by the biggest majority that any President ever got. Mr. President, he went in by a plurality over the Democratic nominee of about 7,000,000 votes, but if we take the Democratic vote and the Progressive vote and the Prohibition vote, his majority was about 2,000,000 and a little over. I remind the Senator that prior to that time Mr. Bryan had made a very pertinent statement about Mr. Taft, to the effect that he "went in by a million majority and went out by unanimous consent." [Laughter.] Mr. Coolidge has announced that he did not choose to run. It shows that he thought the two-term custom should not be violated when he announced to his party that he did not choose to run. Why not let it stand at that and why do not the Senator from Connecticut and others who feel as he does come in and say, "We are going to back Mr. Coolidge up? Why not say he never has intended to have a third term and we are going to vote for the resolution and show that he was in good faith in the position he has taken? We will all vote for it, Democrats and Republicans together." Why not do that?

Mr. President, I beg the Senator from Connecticut to come to the mourners' bench and repent and be saved before it is everlastingly too late. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I merely want to congratulate the Senator from Alabama on the evidence presented today of the strong alliance between the Democratic Party and the divergents—I mean the insurgents, and the digressives—I mean the progressives, in the speeches for the pending resolution. His reference to the fact that the President was elected by such a large majority over the combined efforts of the Democrats and the La Follettes to beat him is merely another evidence of the splendid harmony of this alliance which has forced most of the Republicans, including myself, to be in the minority on every roll call except one in this session.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, February 7, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, dear Lord, that the heavenly vision gives us inward peace. It helps to obliterate sorrow, disappointment, and misfortune. By faith in Thee they lose their power to distress us. We praise Thee that we are not at the hazard of a blind, remorseless force. Holy Spirit, lead us on to the larger and finer attainments; build up the spiritual man and develop the kingdom that is within. Oh, these, our ministries of trust! May they acquire such glory at our hands that criticism can not dull nor infidelity deride. Take our souls, clear them of doubt and of storm cloud; open the doors of our hearts and set our spirits free. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. MADDEN, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill H. R. 10635, making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and with the accompanying papers ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee reserves all points of order.

WATER BOUNDARY, UNITED STATES AND MEXICO

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10636) to make an additional appropriation for the water boundary, United States and Mexico, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to provide an additional amount for the expenses of meeting the obligations of the United States under the treaties of 1884, 1889, 1905, and 1906, between the United States and Mexico, including personal services, procurement of technical and scientific equipment, camp outfits, and the purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, and $1,200 for rent, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $65,000, to remain available until June 30, 1929.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I should like to know what the appropriation is for?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, an estimate came to the Committee on Appropriations from the President for $65,000, requesting that it be appropriated, to be placed in charge of the Secretary of State, who is authorized to have a survey made of the Mexican boundary near El Paso and on the Rio Grande River, the purpose being to enter into a treaty with the Republic of Mexico if the survey discloses justification for the treaty. The treaty has already been negotiated between the boundary commissioners of Mexico and the United States, but the President and the Secretary of State are anxious that no treaty be closed until the survey is made, because without the survey they would not understand the obligations to be imposed upon the United States. One of the things proposed is that the Rio Grande River for 170 miles shall be straightened out, and also that it be made more amenable to the disposition of flood waters than it is to-day; that it be reduced to 75 miles along the river front where it is now 170 miles; that the land on the north side of the river shall become the property of the United States and the land on the south side of the river, when it is straightened, shall become the property of Mexico.

There is involved in this what is known as the Chamizal zone. That has been arbitrated as to ownership. The arbitration award was made in favor of Mexico. The United States refused to accept the award. If this improvement under the proposed treaty be made, then the Chamizal zone will go to the United States.

There is another tract of land about 250 acres in extent, adjoining the city of El Paso, title to which would also go to the United States. It may be that quite a large tract of land would come as a result of straightening out the river. The appropriation sought at this time is only for the purpose of making a survey and thereby ascertaining the wisdom of entering into the treaty between the United States and Mexico. The treaty has already been worked up. I know the contents of the treaty. I have letters and correspondence from the Secretary of State and data showing all of the facts, which I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 28, 1928.

The Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN,
Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. MADDEN: I beg to refer to House Document No. 149, in relation to a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the Department of State for the fiscal year 1929, for the water boundary, United States and Mexico, amounting to $65,000, and to make the following observations with respect thereto:

First. The American commissioner on the International Boundary Commission, United States and Mexico, is at present under instructions to endeavor to reach a basis for a treaty with the Mexican commissioner with respect to the proposed rectification of the Rio Grande in the valley lands between El Paso, Tex., and the Box Canyon below Fort Quitman, Tex., a distance by the river of 170 miles. Important purposes of the work are to prevent the recurrence of disastrous floods throughout this section of the valley, to stabilize the boundary line between the two countries to avert controversial questions which have frequently arisen in this respect during times past and have required great efforts on the part of the Boundary Commission to adjust, and to avoid the creation of areas by the changing course of the river which have become resorts for smugglers and other law violators, whom the two Governments have found it difficult to control because of disputed questions of jurisdiction.

I may say that the so-called Chamizal tract is situated in the area under discussion, and it is hoped that this case, which has been the subject of diplomatic correspondence with Mexico for a period of more than 20 years, may be resolved as a part of the present efforts of our boundary commissioner. It is also hoped to adjust through this enterprise the matter of the so-called Cordova tract adjacent to El Paso, which is now understood to constitute a convenient place for the operations of lawbreakers.

The American commissioner has for some time been engaged in the furtherance of the work in question and now finds it necessary to ask for an additional appropriation of $65,000 so as to enable him to undertake surveys and the preparation of plans and estimates having for their object the assembling of exact information which might form the basis of a treaty with Mexico.

Second. I desire to state in this connection that it was impossible for the department to bring this estimate to the attention of the Congress before our regular appropriation bill was passed.

Third. In view of the important interests which will be served by the work which I have briefly outlined, it is of the utmost importance that an appropriation be made at the earliest possible date in order that the survey can be begun and the negotiations for the treaty be concluded.

I am, my dear Mr. MADDEN,

Sincerely yours,

FRANK B. KELLOGG.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 3, 1928.

The Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MADDEN: I am very grateful to you for the consideration you showed on Wednesday to Assistant Secretary Carr and the solicitor, Mr. Hackworth, when they called upon you at my request to explain the necessity for an appropriation of $65,000 for the International Boundary Commission, United States and Mexico. In accordance with the request which you expressed to them I am now inclosing a memorandum setting forth the facts in relation to that estimate, together with a copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Interior giving the views of the Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation in regard to the matter.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANK B. KELLOGG.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 1, 1928.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Pursuant to telephone conversation with you I transmit herewith memorandum prepared at my request by Doctor Mead, Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation, regarding the proposed convention with Mexico for rectifying the Rio Grande and establishment of a more stabilized boundary line between the United States and Mexico.

Very truly yours,

HUBERT WORK.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF RECLAMATION,
Washington, February 1, 1928.

Memorandum for the Secretary.

Some of the advantages that would follow the consummation of the proposed convention with Mexico regarding the rectification of the Rio Grande and establishment of a more stabilized boundary line between the United States and Mexico may be summarized as follows:

In connection with the Rio Grande project the Bureau of Reclamation has expended in the El Paso Valley below El Paso, in round numbers, $6,000,000 in the construction of irrigation and drainage works. In the present state of the river these works are constantly endangered from overflow and erosion. The floods originating above Elephant Butte Dam in New Mexico are effectively regulated by that structure. The regulation of the floods, however, because of the limited amounts of water now carried during periods of low flow, increases the difficulty of maintaining an open and stable channel for carrying the floods originating below the Elephant Butte Dam located about 125 miles above El Paso. The channel becomes restricted when only small quantities of water are being carried and the comparatively small floods which now occur are not sufficient to scour out the channel and keep it open. The bed of the river at El Paso and below has been gradually increasing in elevation by deposition of silt until now it is almost impossible to maintain a stable channel of sufficient capacity to carry even the comparatively small floods originating below the Elephant Butte Dam.

The agricultural area on the American side of the river has been extended and improved at very large expense. This area, tributary to the Rio Grande project, now extends for some 60 miles along the Rio Grande below El Paso and is now in a highly prosperous condition. The desirability of protecting this area and the works of the Rio Grande project can not be too strongly emphasized.

The convention, if carried out, will be of great advantage in settling the controversy that has existed for many years concerning the Chamizal zone, which embraces a considerable part of the city of El Paso and other territory, including irrigable lands below. The uncertainty which now exists concerning nationality and land titles in this and other areas along the river below would be eliminated. The convention proposes to place under the dominion of the United States the lands north of the rectified channel. This action will correct the difficulties mentioned. The plan proposed will also render less difficult the enforcement of the customs and immigration laws by establishing the nationality and jurisdiction of the respective areas which are now fraught with uncertainty and change with the alignment of the river.

ELWOOD MEAD,
Commissioner.

PROPOSED SURVEY FOR THE PURPOSE OF ASCERTAINING FACTS PRELIMINARY TO THE POSSIBLE NEGOTIATION OF A TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO FOR THE STABILIZATION OF THE BOUNDARY LINE BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO

In the early part of 1927 the American member of the International Boundary Commission, United States and Mexico, was instructed to proceed with negotiations with the Mexican commissioner with a view to an agreement between the two Governments upon the rectification of the Rio Grande River in the El Paso and Juarez Valleys. In November, 1927, the commissioner submitted a tentative draft of a proposed agreement which contemplated a rectification and straightening of the river channel, beginning 2 miles above El Paso, Tex., and continuing to the Box River Canyon below Fort Quitman, a distance by the river of about 170 miles, and involving an area of approximately 200 square miles of land directly adjacent to the river. In this area there exists over 3,000 acres of land now largely held by American citizens, over which there exists disputes as to ownership. Portions of this area are located within the city limits of El Paso and are highly valuable. Included in this area is the territory embraced in the well-known Chamizal case, once submitted to arbitration by the two Governments, decided by the arbitral tribunal to be in Mexico, a decision which the United States declined to accept. The ownership of the area is therefore still in dispute. By the present river the distance between El Paso and Fort Quitman, Tex., is 142 miles. By the proposed straightened channel the distance would be 75 miles. It is contemplated by the members of the Boundary Commission that once the channel should be straightened and the boundary line stabilized there should be an exchange of property so that all on the north side of the stabilized channel should be United States territory and all on the south side should be the territory of Mexico, and among the exchanges to be effected would be that of the famous Chamizal area in El Paso, which it is understood to be the purpose to transfer to the United States.

The Rio Grande River, as is well known, is the international boundary line between El Paso and Fort Quitman, Tex. It is fluctuating in discharge and meandering in location. Large and sudden floods are a menace to improvements to public property. The damage from such floods in 1925 was over $500,000. Since 1921 various attempts to provide protection works have been unsuccessful, due to the international character of the necessary investigations and to the known international character of the proposed protection works. For two years the Mexican authorities have been organized and ready to cooperate in the development of plans and estimates for this work. Land values are seriously affected by the lack of plans for rectification works. Such temporary protective levees as are being constructed should be built in conformity with some permanent plan, and no such plan exists. The flood menace is becoming more acute because of the filling of the river channel. It is thought that unless some plan for the rectification of the channel is developed and carried out, a disestablishment of the irrigation and drainage works now serving over 80,000 acres on the American side may result. The city and county of El Paso have in the past few years expended through bond issues one-half million dollars in providing protective and drainage works on unsuitable locations following sharp bends in the river. Immigration, customs, and prohibition laws are difficult of enforcement.

After a consideration of the draft convention submitted by the boundary commissioners of the two Governments it seemed to the Department of State that the first step to be taken should be to determine the location of the proposed rectified channel and of the essential protection works, the areas of land which would be affected by the project, and the cost of carrying the plans into effect. The American commissioner was therefore instructed to formulate plans and estimate the cost of a survey for the purpose of assembling exact information upon the points mentioned. The estimate for this survey is $65,000.

SCOPE AND MAGNITUDE OF PROJECT

The area under consideration, amounting to over 80,000 acres on the United States side, is that included in the valley lands between El Paso and Fort Quitman, Tex. Surveying and mapping would include about 170 miles of the river. The field work would consist of actual location of the present river channel, the establishment of cut-offs to effect the straightening of the channel, including the location of new sections. After preliminary paper locations are made from airplane mosaic maps, profiles of the center line of the rectified channel would be made and include data to show present water surfaces of the river at various points. Detached and separated areas would be mapped and connections to establish proper lines made in order that accurate maps could be prepared showing areas and improvements involved.

These data are to be acquired for lands in the United States on the basis that the Mexican section of the Boundary Commission would obtain similar information, location, and data for Mexican areas.

PERSONNEL OF SURVEY PARTIES

It would be necessary to place two complete survey parties in the field, each composed of one chief of party, one instrument man, one draftsmen, two chainmen, two rodmen, two axmen, and one cook and camp helper. An additional instrument man is provided for level work required in obtaining river elevation and other topographical data. The salary for the positions mentioned are those which have been established in the community for similar work, both private and public. It is expected that there will be six months field work and two additional months for office work, or a total of eight months for the entire survey.

EQUIPMENT SUPPLIES AND MATERIAL

Two survey cars will be required, one for each field party and one truck for moving camp and handling supplies and materials. A considerable amount of work is located at too great a distance from where accommodations and field quarters can be obtained, and it will require the establishment of camps with proper equipment to subsist and quarter field parties when on location work at some distance from towns and settlements.

AIRPLANE MAPPING

An item of $2,000 is included for cooperative work with the Army Air Service in providing a mosaic map of the territory under consideration. Such maps have been used to advantage in other work and, in addition to the saving in preliminary surveys, they provide means for ascertaining location and kind of improvements and other natural and artificial features.

URGENCY OF APPROPRIATION

Inasmuch as the negotiations have been going on for a number of months and the representatives of the two Governments are now in agreement on the main points of the project, it would seem desirable that no time should be lost in making the necessary survey and, if the facts ascertained shall warrant, concluding a treaty for the disposition of the questions under consideration. A delay in the survey might easily result in failure to obtain a definite agreement between the two Governments. Therefore it is thought desirable that the appropriation should be available at the earliest possible moment in order that the members of the Boundary Commission may proceed without delay with the survey.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Is this the same proposition which was before the Committee on Foreign Affairs and which was reported out favorably?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. It is the one over which the Foreign Affairs Committee has no jurisdiction, because we are acting under the existing treaty.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I thought that it is proposed to make the new treaty.

Mr. MADDEN. The action that we are taking is under authority of the old treaty, but it is proposed to enter into a new treaty.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, I do this in order to thank the chairman and the Committee on Appropriations for hastening the passage of this bill at this time. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] stated, this treaty, which, although I have not seen, I know some of its contents, brings to the United States about $50,000,000 worth of property, as I understand, which has been in dispute for many years. The Chamizal zone takes in about one-fourth of the city of El Paso, where I live; also the Cordova cut-off adjacent to El Paso, which I understand goes to the United States. The treaty now settles all these disputes in regard to these strips of land from El Paso to Fort Quitman, and not only that, but it stabilizes the river so that in the future it will not change its course overnight. It is a very important matter to El Paso city and county and also to the United States Government.

Senator SHEPPARD, our able Senator from Texas, and myself have worked for about six or seven years to bring about a settlement of these disputed matters, making dozens of visits to the State Department, the War Department, and the White House, and I want to state here and now we have had not only the active cooperation and assistance of the various Secretaries of State but the able and efficient assistants under them, and the President, who have worked in season and out to get a just and amicable agreement with our neighbors to the south of the Rio Grande, and I am much gratified at the success attained by our very able and diplomatic boundary commissioner, Hon. L. M. Lawson, of El Paso, who negotiated this splendid agreement with the Mexican boundary commissioner, which, I understand, is just to all parties concerned. Also, able gentlemen from El Paso have come to Washington and lent splendid assistance, viz, Major Burgess, ex-Mayor Jackson, Judge E. B. McClentock, Mr. Lawson, and many others. These gentlemen are patriotic Americans and deserve commendation at the hands of our Government and my city and county and the farmers and citizens in the valley below El Paso.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It is in contemplation that the appropriation is for straightening out the river?

Mr. HUDSPETH. No. It is to make a survey so that the information obtained may be conveyed to the Senate with the proposed treaty.

Mr. RANKIN. If the gentleman has found a committee that can stabilize the Rio Grande I would like to have it stabilize the Mississippi.

Mr. HUDSPETH. These cuts that will be made will have the effect of stabilizing the river and will shorten it about 70 miles from El Paso to the Box Canyon, I will say to my friend from Mississippi. The engineers state that when the channel is straightened it will dredge itself and maintain itself without change in future and also prevent overflow to many acres of cultivated land. I sincerely thank my friends on both sides for aiding in the passage of this bill by giving unanimous consent of the House at this time. [Applause.]

MEMORIAL FROM WISCONSIN LEGISLATURE

Mr. KADING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD a short resolution passed by the Wisconsin Legislature memorializing Congress to enact necessary legislation for a survey of the Wisconsin and Fox Rivers waterway.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. What is the resolution? Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what the resolution is.

Mr. KADING. It is a short resolution of the Wisconsin Legislature memorializing Congress to enact necessary legislation for a survey of the Wisconsin and Fox Rivers waterway.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I thought it might be a resolution to pass some modification of the Volstead Act, because, I understand, the State of Wisconsin has gone wet. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is this wholly within the State of Wisconsin?

Mr. KADING. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Did the gentleman from Maryland say he was in favor of that resolution?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am in favor of water as a chaser. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Following is the resolution referred to:

Joint Resolution 9, memorializing the Congress of the United States to enact necessary legislation for a survey of the Wisconsin-Fox Rivers waterway

Whereas competent and disinterested engineers report that the nearest feasible connecting link between the Mississippi River and the Great Lakes is a direct route from Green Bay, Oshkosh, and Portage to the Gulf of Mexico; and

Whereas even a casual inspection of a map of this proposed route will show its many great natural advantages. It is a waterway already in existence and navigable for large boats for most of the route. From Green Bay to Portage there is a total distance of 156 miles and from Portage to Prairie du Chien of 117 miles. Between the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers at Portage there is a canal of 2¼ miles. In the Fox River portion of this route there are now 27 locks and 16 United States dams. There is an existing project for the improvement of the Fox River, which provides for a channel 6 feet deep from De Pere, near Green Bay, to Montello, and 4 feet deep from Montello to Portage. At Portage a new lock was ordered constructed in 1927 at a contract price of $163,700. In the Wisconsin River, at a point 28 miles below Portage, in 1915 a power dam, which contains a lock, was completed, which makes the Wisconsin River navigable between these points with the exception of about 6 miles. Six other dams are needed to make the entire distance to the mouth of the Wisconsin navigable, even in low-water stages. The construction of these dams, it is estimated, will produce 350,000,000 kilowatt-hours of water power, which will greatly reduce the net cost of this improvement; and

Whereas a great deal of tonnage has moved over the Fox River and big boats have traversed these waters by way of Green Bay, Oshkosh, and Portage and a great deal more would be moved if the Government would build the necessary dams and complete the unfinished projects; and

Whereas the Government gets very little, if any, returns from the investments already made, because they do not represent a comprehensive program of improving the entire route; and

Whereas less than the cost of one Government battleship would be required to build the dams needed to make this route a success: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Wisconsin Legislature respectfully memorializes the United States Congress to authorize and direct a full survey of the Wisconsin-Fox Rivers waterway and to enact such legislation as will result in the completion of such waterway; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution, properly signed by the presiding officers of both houses and attested by the chief clerks thereof, be sent to the presiding officers of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States and to each Senator and Member of Congress from Wisconsin.

HENRY A. HUBER,
President of the Senate.
O. G. MUNSON,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
JOHN W. EBER,
Speaker of the Assembly.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

ALASKA

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL] for 35 minutes.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, in the Atlantic Monthly of January, 1928, there is an article entitled "Alaska," written by Col. Wilds P. Richardson. Quite recently the Washington Post editorially advised every Member of Congress to read this article and expressed the opinion that it would furnish Congress with the truth about this Territorial possession. Without doubt many Members of Congress have read the article and have found it entertaining. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 13 discloses that my good friend Congressman TREADWAY has read it, for in debate he both quotes it and comments upon it.

It is not surprising that this article has been quoted in part in debate on the floor of the House nor that it will be referred to frequently in subsequent debates. It will be surprising if every Member reads it, and it will be more surprising if, after having read it, the reader will be disposed to eliminate the matters therein set forth that can have no possible bearing upon the policy Congress ought to follow in Alaska affairs.

A comparison of the amount of money involved in the purchase of Alaska, negotiating the Louisiana Purchase, or discharging our treaty obligations to acquire Florida ought not to be a factor of any importance at all in considering what we are now going to do in fully discharging our duties as the Congress of the United States to this outlying possession. We bought Alaska and we paid for it.

It has paid a handsome profit on the investment, even according to the figures of those who are most displeased with our ownership. We have before us no prospective real estate transactions either of purchase or of sale, and if it should be proposed to sell Alaska to the present Government of Russia, to Japan, or even to Canada, assuming that any one or all of these Government were prospective purchasers, there is in all human probability not a Member in the Senate or the House who would vote or argue for such a disposal of the Territory. And the reason for such unanimity of opinion would not flow from the pen of the arithmetical acrobat, but would be found to be grounded in public policy just as it was in 1867 when Alaska was purchased. I can not agree entirely with Colonel Richardson on all of his alleged facts.

It appears from what the colonel has to say that he is not satisfied with the route over which the Government constructed the railroad, with the personnel selected to build it, with its present management, with its earnings, nor with the purpose it now subserves. If there is anything else particularly wrong with it, my distinguished colleague from Massachusetts can be depended upon to supplement on the floor of the House what Colonel Richardson has neglected to state.

Colonel Richardson is satisfied with the road and trail work in Alaska carried on under his supervision. Without doubt it meets not only with his approval but with the approval of the residents of the Territory, who always have a good word for Colonel "Dick" and are pleased to have the automobile road from Valdez to Fairbanks, a distance of 371 miles, known as the Richardson Highway. The fact that the Alaska Railroad cost more than was either expected or anticipated does not prove that it is useless. Who is there in carrying out any project, even to the building of a house, who has been so experienced a builder that the fund with which he started has been entirely sufficient? We have the railroad, and even if it fails to-day to measure up as a development project to all that has been represented for it, it would be most unwise to advocate that it be abandoned, scrapped, or sold. They who voted for it in the first instance should not have done so if they expected it would immediately be a paying investment for the Government. Such has not been the history of railroad building by those great transcontinental lines that have figured so conspicuously in the development of all those States west of the Atlantic seaboard.

One should not be particularly impressed with the outstanding criticism made of the city of Seattle in its efforts to foster development in the Territory of Alaska. Maybe it has put its best foot forward a bit too far at times and not advanced toward the goal of its ambition with the most consistent stride, but there is this to say about the cities of the Pacific coast: They have a right to be interested in Alaska and the chances are they have been no more optimistic in their representations about Alaska than any other city in the United States would have been if it had had so alluring a prospect at its front door.

It is, of course, altogether possible that in reading the article mentioned and entitled "Alaska" the reader will not grasp the author's purpose. No definite problem is stated and therefore no solution is attempted. There is the recital of a long list of mistakes and an appeal from the scenic standpoint.

Now, let us get at some of the facts with reference to Alaska. In the first place, it seems to be unanimously agreed that its scenery is all right. In the second place, it is admitted that it has produced approximately one and one-quarter billions of gold, minerals, and raw products that have been shipped to the States. I take the author's figures that, all told, this possession has cost the United States about $200,000,000, and this includes the railroad at a cost of $70,000,000. Not such a bad showing at that. Mind you, now, of this more than one and one-quarter billions of dollars of wealth over $353,000,000 has been in gold. The wealth that this Territory has produced has not remained there, but has come to the States and has been no small factor in the building up of the Pacific coast. Had the wealth remained in Alaska, and had Alaska been so located that conditions there presented as great an appeal as is presented by conditions in the States, Alaska would have even a larger population than it is suggested it ought to have.

The trouble is over the word "development." You can not go up to Alaska and bring its wealth down to the United States and develop Alaska. You are developing the United States by that process. There is nothing wrong about it. The thing that is wrong is the continual harping about this mistake and that mistake and trying to charge to the people of the Territory that they do not have a more populous country to produce more wealth to come to the United States, and fussing about every cent of appropriation that, in the nature of things, is required under our present governmental policy to keep the flow of wealth coming in a constantly increasing stream. Bringing a lot of people from northern Europe to Alaska alone is not going to effect the development about which there is so much talk. The greater amount of this kind of development will come from within and not from without. The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts seems to think that what Alaska needs more than anything else is immigration to the Territory. He feels so strongly upon that point that he would almost be willing to repeal the restriction law so far as it applies to Alaska and permit any and all classes of people to emigrate to this Territory. Congress has, by the passage of the restrictive immigration law, tried to protect the people of the United States against undesirables, and, so far as I am concerned, I think the people of Alaska are entitled to the same protection against such class of emigrants as are the people of Massachusetts or any other State in the Union.

Let me add that the white citizens of Alaska are just as patriotic, intelligent, and law-abiding as are the citizens of any other part of the United States. I admit that immigration of the right kind will be welcomed by the people of Alaska and will help to bring about a healthy development of the Territory; but it is my judgment that what is most needed is a little encouragement to the people who pioneered that country and who have spent the best years of their lives there and are rearing families, because, after all, the real development of the Territory must come through them.

According to the report of the Governor of Alaska for the year 1925, Alaska shipped to the United States raw products to the value of $61,042,862, and the United States shipped to Alaska merchandise to the value of $33,621,969. In 1926 the figures were $61,071,867 shipped out and $31,774,477 shipped in. These figures tell the story rather than does a comparison of the purchase price of Alaska with the Louisiana purchase. In 1927 exports amounted to $80,018,034 and imports amounted to $32,062,902.

There were employed in commercial fisheries in Alaska in 1926, 28,052 persons, of whom it appears that at least 20,000 were residents of the States and went to Alaska to take advantage of a seasonal occupation. Presumably they are hired in the cities of the Pacific coast, are paid off when they return to the States, and spend their money in the States. One may wish a different situation to exist. No one has yet discovered a way to make the wealth produced in a certain section stay there. Manhattan Island would have had a difficult job on hand to raise enough garden truck to build Wall Street, small as it is.

It is hardly to be expected that the gentleman from Massachusetts is going to want to live in Alaska. It seems that Colonel Richardson spent most of his summers in Alaska, but his winters, and possibly part of his cash, were spent in Washington, D. C. There is nothing either wrong or unusual about it. The building of the Government railroad helped to develop the United States more than Alaska. There was the hope that it would induce more people to go to Alaska and live there, but the facts are the States wanted the coal it believed Alaska possessed for its Navy on the Pacific coast. It seems there was some misinformation somewhere. The United States hoped the building of this railroad would stimulate mining and that the minerals within access to the railroad would eventually come to the United States. None of its several activities, except under the Bureau of Education and agricultural experiment stations, could be expected to be directly the means of bringing a permanent population to any particular section. There was the hope that the building of the railroad would be an inducement for more homes and more people in the Territory, but it is safe to say that no Member of Congress knew at the time he voted for the bill of any person or any group of people whom he was expecting to go to Alaska and to reside there permanently.

But what about this railroad? The gentleman from Massachusetts told the House, in his remarks, that the railroad is a colossal failure. That a part of it was built upon a glacier and had to be rebuilt each year. I am sure the gentleman is mistaken in these facts. The facts I have obtained from the Department of the Interior, and from what I have observed, are to the effect that no part of the railroad is built upon a glacier or upon glacial ice, and no portion has to be rebuilt each year. In some places the thawing of frozen roadbed is troublesome, but that condition is being remedied now by drainage and ballasting.

Freight inbound over the railroad consists of all kinds of general supplies and outfit, such as food, clothing, building machinery, automobiles, oil, gasoline, and so forth. Outbound freight is of less volume. A large part of the money earned by patrons of the railroad comes from the gold-mining industry, the product of which is shipped out by mail and express, and is in small volume. The outgoing tonnage consists mainly of ore concentrates, canned fish, and coal.

About half the tonnage handled by the railroad is coal from the local mines, most of which is carried to points on the railroad. A small amount, however, is transferred to boats at Anchorage or Seward for delivery to canneries.

The entire line of the railroad is in operation throughout the year. About 30 per cent of the tonnage is handled during the five months of November, December, January, February, and March. The winter operation is of importance to the public, as much of the freight for outlying points, off the railroad, must be carried by sleds, which can be done at reasonable cost only when the ground is frozen and covered with snow. At that time sleds can travel over frozen swamps, lakes, and streams, and over roads that are too soft to permit heavy hauling over them in the summer months.

During the fiscal year 1925 the railroad hauled 53,965 tons of commercial freight, and in 1927, 82,416 tons, an increase of 52.8 per cent. While a continuance of this rate of increase can not be expected, there is every reason to believe that a substantial increase will occur each year.

Material for two of the seven dredges to be installed in the district north of Fairbanks were received in December and are now in course of erection. A contract has been placed for local coal for use in the power plant that will furnish electric energy for these dredges. It is estimated that when all the dredges are in operation 60,000 tons of coal will be required annually for this one enterprise.

Interests representing English capital are considering the development of a large lode mine and construction of a stamp mill, in the Fairbanks district, also the development of deposits of tin ore in the Hot Springs district and antimony in the Kantishna country.

Antimony: An element of metallic appearance and crystalline structure tin-white in color, hard and brittle, used chiefly in alloys to give hardness and the property of expanding on solidification. Its compounds are used in medicine and in the arts.

Other encouraging prospects are having consideration, some of which will no doubt become actual producers of traffic for the railroad.

Passenger traffic over the Alaska Railroad to and from interior Alaska is showing a consistent and substantial increase from year to year. This condition is due in large measure to the fact that the several rail and steamship transportation companies interested in the development of tourist travel to and throughout Alaska, are succeeding, through various publicity channels, in presenting Alaska's many attractions to the traveling public and to transportation representatives. It is likewise due to the fact that in Mount McKinley Park, and at other points throughout Alaska, transportation and hotel accommodations for travelers are being enlarged and improved from year to year. Actually, at the present time, tourist travel to and throughout Alaska is in its infancy.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Can the gentleman give us any information relative to the accommodations that are available to tourists in Mount McKinley Park?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes. I will come to that in a few moments.

The cost of operating the road has decreased annually and the income has steadily increased, so that the actual deficit for the fiscal year 1927 was about $900,000.

I am placing in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a comparative statement of operating revenues and expenses of the railroad for the past three or four years, which shows there has been a gradual reduction in the cost of operation and a gradual increase in the total revenue:

And now what about the development in which the Members of this House are interested? I went to Alaska last summer to see if I could learn something about the people who are making their homes there. I did not go on a 20-day tour of criticism with a notebook full of figures about the cost of Florida, or the corn crop of Iowa. I went there with my wife and we stayed in the Territory from August 4 to September 20. I learned that this railroad about which there has been so much criticism made possible the transportation to its interior terminus of the heavy equipment and supplies necessary to mine the worked-over placers and low-grade virgin placers of the section adjacent to Fairbanks. I found that initial expenditures on the project will amount to something like $16,000,000, and that these placers are calculated to produce during the next 20 to 25 years upwards of $150,000,000.

Let me tell you something more about the work contemplated by the Fairbanks Exploration Co. In expending $16,000,000 they are constructing—and have practically completed—a ditch 86 miles long, 12 feet wide at the bottom and 25 feet wide at the top, for the purpose of bringing water from a reservoir formed from the waters of Faith, Hope, and Charity Creeks over this placer territory in order to wash the gold at these placer mines. And may I say for the benefit of the gentleman from Massachusetts, if he does not already know, that the greater part of the capital invested in the Fairbanks Exploration Co. comes from the people of his State. It is very interesting to note this development. At places the ditch is built in the sides of the mountain. One mountain is tunneled through. At other places steel pipe 4 feet in diameter is used to syphon the water over the mountain. The work is furnishing employment for hundreds of men, and I understand this is only the first of a number of similar developments to be undertaken by this same company. In Fairbanks they have constructed a great power plant at a cost of $1,500,000.

As I have already stated, I went to Alaska for the purpose of investigating as much as I could the existing conditions and to get a true insight into this great frontier. I traveled probably a thousand miles out of Fairbanks in different directions. A road is now about completed from Fairbanks to Circle City, over which we traveled. I pioneered some parts of Alaska from the hurricane deck of a horse and spent several nights as a sourdough, sleeping on a bed of birch poles—my only covering a buffalo robe and the stars. And let me add that I never in my experience found a higher type of citizenship than I found among the miners and prospectors during these trips of exploration.

The people of the States are led to believe that Alaska is nothing more or less than an iceberg, that the only means of transportation is by dog teams, and that nothing grows there. Let me give you my experience on the 1st day of September of last year. The agricultural fair was held in Fairbanks on the first three days of that month, and I was invited to and did deliver a speech at the opening of this fair. I was agreeably surprised at the exhibition of agricultural products, such as potatoes, onions, celery, beets, cabbage, and, in fact, every kind of garden vegetable that is raised in any State of the United States was shown there and is raised in abundance in and around Fairbanks. I venture to say that no section of our country ever produced finer or better vegetables than we found in Alaska. I saw two heads of cabbage that tipped the scales at 101 pounds. When remarking about them to an old prospector at the fair, he said:

> Why, that ain't nothin'. I called up the man who raised this cabbage the other day and told him I wanted him to make me a barrel of kraut. In the evenin' he called me back and said, "I have your barrel of kraut ready. What do you want me to do with the other half of the head of cabbage?"

Another product I desire to mention is the sugar beet. These sugar beets were analyzed and shown to have from 17 to 18 per cent sugar content and to be from 81 to 90 per cent pure, and the yield to be upward of 10 tons per acre. I do not care to go on record as saying that Alaska will ever be a great agricultural country, yet there are thousands upon thousands of acres of land that will produce such vegetables as I have mentioned.

The Department of Agriculture has released for information a statement relative to unifying its Alaskan development work. A year ago Congress paved the way to a better organization of Federal activities in the Territory by giving the power to Secretaries of the Interior, Commerce, and Agriculture to designate local representatives as Resident Commissioners. The Secretary of Agriculture has defined the functions and authority of the commissioners so designated. He is of the opinion that Alaska must be built up on permanent lines through the creation and enlargement of industries that will stay, and says further:

It has unknown but certainly important agricultural possibilities; great timber-growing possibilities; great possibilities for meat and fur production and the like, and the certainty of large-scale permanent manufacturing enterprises in the course of time.

In my judgment, the surface has only been scratched of the rich store of minerals to be found in this country. Coal, iron, and tin there is in abundance. The coal mines have not been developed because of the high cost of transportation, but what a wonderful reservoir of minerals is there, to be used in the future. I traversed upon one occasion a canyon known as the Healy River Canyon, and inspected the Healy River coal mine in operation there. I walked into a tunnel in the mountain for perhaps a quarter of a mile, and in that distance found 162 feet of workable coal, the veins averaging from 16 to 50 feet. Farther up this canyon I came upon another mine called the Roth coal mine, which has not been developed. I had heard so much about this coal that I crawled into a small opening in the mine and secured a small piece of the coal and brought it out. I struck an ordinary match, held it under the piece of coal and it immediately ignited.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has led you to believe that the ground in Alaska is frozen the year round to bedrock.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield there, or is he unwilling to be interrupted?

Mr. VESTAL. I will yield in a moment.

Of course, that statement is exaggerated. There are parts of Alaska where the ground is frozen to bedrock and only thaws a couple or 3 feet at any time in the year. But there are other places where the thermometer does not even register as low as zero at any time of the year. We left Valdez about the 20th of September, and that day for lunch in Valdez we had strawberries picked from the garden there. I only mention these things to show that the whole of Alaska, at least, can not be termed an iceberg. I never saw more beautiful flowers in sunny California than were blooming in Alaska.

Of course, as the gentleman from Massachusetts has well said, the scenery in Alaska is probably the finest in the world. In my judgment if a roadway were constructed in McKinley Park so that the tourists could get near the foot of Mount McKinley, and a hotel were built, on the order of the one at Curry, thousands of people would win their way to Alaska every summer.

I believe the best way we can help the people of Alaska to develop their Territory is to encourage the building of decent and adequate highways wherever possible. And let me say here that while Alaska is rich in its scenery, in its minerals, and in its timber and fur-bearing animals, it is richer in the class and character of its people. They are fearless, honest, and law-abiding and are of the type who settled in the unknown wilds of Kentucky, Tennessee, Oregon, and Washington in the early days. Their children are healthy and sturdy, and are being taught and brought up with a wholesome respect for law and order and for the principles of the Government under which they live. They are patriotic citizens, too, and during the World War contributed a greater percentage of able-bodied men of draft age, according to population, than any other State or Territory in our country, to fight for the flag. It is a record of which any people may well be proud.

I found Fairbanks to be a pioneer city of homes, slowly but surely attaining the development which the Member from time to time mentioned. Soon after my arrival I was invited to speak at the opening of the Empress Theater, and delivered a speech to an audience of 700 persons seated in a concrete, fireproof building, the construction of which cost something like $200,000. I found a happy, contented pioneer class of men and women developing this part of our northern domain with gardens, farms, schools, and churches, and contributing in no small measure to the high ideals that go with American citizenship. [Applause.]

There, too, I found the last land-grant college established under the Morrill Act of 1862, the "farthest north" college in the world. It is an institution that during its first four years has grown from an enrollment of 62 to 164, and carries on regular four-year college courses. I saw a town of some 2,500 inhabitants, with the requisite number of automobiles—some 600—and tourists coming and going by the hundred, either by rail over the Alaska Railroad or by auto over the Richardson Highway. Airplanes were coming and going nearly every day to distant points. I met these pioneers of the north and the young men and women born there and found them worthy of the responsibility they have undertaken—and that is, to do a lot for the United States, with the hope that in the "doing" process they will be accomplishing a little for themselves.

I have introduced in Congress a bill which is now before the Agricultural Committee which seeks to extend the provisions of the Hatch, Adams, and Purnell Acts—granting certain moneys to land-grant colleges—to this college in Alaska. I hope the bill may be favorably reported by the committee and passed in the House. I can see no reason why a land-grant college in Alaska should not receive the same benefits as the similar colleges in any other State of the Union.

Referring again to the report of the governor for 1927, and to that of 1926, 1925, and 1924, we find that the public-school enrollment is increasing. In the records of Congress we find that the progressive citizenry of the north has been to Congress repeatedly for authorization to issue bonds to build fireproof modern school buildings—which bonds, I may say, have been oversubscribed when issued.

Alaska is helping to develop the United States. Her balance of trade does not mean that the difference is her profit, as would ordinarily be the case. That balance of trade is in favor of those who live in the States. This possession of ours is one of the sources of our own development. The appropriations Alaska receives are small in comparison with the wealth she pours into the United States. Her own development—that is, the kind we want her to have—is slow, but it is sure and it comes from within.

I pledge myself not only to Alaska but to the people of the States to give my best efforts to an unbiased consideration of the needs of the people of Alaska, to the end that the prosperity which the United States enjoys by virtue of the physical location of that Territory shall not mitigate against those of our citizens who make their permanent homes in the northland and whose prosperity contributes more to the well-being of the United States than it does to the prosperity of Alaska. [Applause.]

CONSTRUCTION OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 278) to amend section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of certain public buildings, and for other purposes," approved May 25, 1926, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 278) to amend section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of certain public buildings, and for other purposes," approved May 25, 1926.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to take the bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, is that the result of an agreement made between the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] and the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes. I have conferred with Mr. LANHAM.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. ELLIOTT, Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee, and Mr. LANHAM.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10286, the War Department appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10286, the War Department appropriation bill, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the War Department appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10286) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on Friday a point of order was pending against the last paragraph read. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LETTS] is recognized.

Mr. LETTS. Mr. Chairman, I now wish to withdraw the point of order that I made on Friday.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa withdraws the point of order on the pending paragraph.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, and ask unanimous consent to return to page 24, line 21, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to return to page 24, line 21, for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment proposed by Mr. BULWINKLE: On page 24, in line 21, after the word "for," strike out "officers' quarters" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "quarters for officers, warrant officers, and noncommissioned officers."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BULWINKLE: On page 24, line 21, after the word "for," strike out the words "officers' quarters" and insert: "quarters for officers, warrant officers, and noncommissioned officers."

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, on Thursday, when the bill was under consideration, there was some dispute as to what was meant by the words "officers and noncommissioned officers." I am offering this amendment for the purpose of clarifying those words so that everyone may understand them.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHEMICAL WARFARE SERVICE

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BURTON: On page 46, line 16, strike out the figures "$1,304,780" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$1,249,780."

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to restore in the bill the estimate of the Budget, which was increased $55,000 by the Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations in their report to the House. This involves the whole question of the use of poisonous gas in warfare. A year ago last January I addressed the House on this subject and was compelled to say that the action of our Government in this regard came very near to bad faith. If there is any one stand this country has taken in its treaties and negotiations with foreign countries in the last seven years, it has been in opposition to the use of poisonous gas in warfare. In our treaties with Germany, Austria, and Hungary a reference is made to the treaty of Versailles, and in those treaties will be found this provision:

The use of asphyxiating, poisonous, or other gases and all analogous liquids, materials, or devices being prohibited, their manufacture and importation are strictly forbidden.

In Germany, in Austria, and in Hungary the manufacture and importation, both alike, of these materials are prohibited.

In the conference of 1921–22 Mr. Hughes, then Secretary of State, brought forward this question of the prohibition of poisonous gas under that feature of the agenda which was termed "Rules for control of new agencies of warfare." An advisory committee was chosen, made up of military and naval experts from our own country, and from this committee there was a unanimous expression in favor of the prohibition of poisonous gas and liquids. On that subject our General Pershing, who was the chairman, said:

Chemical warfare should be abolished among nations as abhorrent to civilization. It is a cruel, unfair, and improper use of science. It is fraught with the gravest danger to noncombatants and demoralizes the better instincts of humanity.

The General Board of the Navy submitted a report, in which they said:

The General Board believes it to be sound policy to prohibit gas warfare in every form against every objective, and so recommends.

Mr. MERRITT. What was the date of that report?

Mr. BURTON. That in 1921–22, just prior to the treaties made here at Washington. Mr. Elihu Root presented this resolution:

The use in war of asphyxiating, poisonous, or other gases and all analogous liquids, materials, or devices, having been justly condemned by the general opinion of the civilized world, and a prohibition of such use having been declared in treaties to which the majority of the civilized powers are parties:

Now, to the end that this prohibition shall be universally accepted as a part of international law, binding alike the conscience and practice of nations, the signatory powers declare their assent to such prohibition, agree to be bound, especially between themselves, and invite all other civilized nations to adhere thereto.

The French delegation, the British delegation, and the Japanese delegation supported this.

As a result, a treaty was framed, signed by the five powers on February 6, 1922, in the following form:

The use in war of asphyxiating, poisonous, or other gases, and all analogous liquids, materials, or devices, having been justly condemned by the general opinion of the civilized world, and the prohibition of such use having been declared in treaties to which a majority of the civilized powers are parties;

The signatory powers, to the end that this prohibition shall be universally accepted as a part of international law binding alike the conscience and practice of nations, declare their assent to such prohibition, agree to be bound thereby as between themselves, and invite all other civilized nations to adhere thereto.

The United States Senate, on March 29, 1922, unanimously advised and consented to the ratification of this treaty. There was more in the treaty, a duty imposed on the United States.

The Government of the United States will further transmit to each of the nonsignatory powers a duly certified copy of the present treaty and invite its adherence thereto.

In the Conference for the Control of International Traffic in Arms, held at Geneva, in 1925, our State Department instructed the American delegation to insist on a similar provision there.

With enthusiasm, I may say, a protocol was approved by some 42 nations that were represented there. It was supported by Germany, Japan, Italy, France, and England.

I quote very briefly from a famous orator, M. Paul-Boncour, who was chairman of the French delegation:

The military regulations of France on the conduct of the larger units begin with these words: "Faithful to the international undertakings which France has signed, the French Government will, on the outbreak of war, and in agreement with the Allies, endeavor to obtain from enemy governments an understanding that they will not employ gas as a weapon of war."

That is set out not in a vague proclamation, not in a political manifesto, but in the forefront of our military regulations. It is the doctrine which the French Government intends to guide the action of its superior commanders, its officers, its noncommissioned officers, and its common soldiers.

Now, if there is any one thing which should characterize the policy of a country, it is fidelity to its treaty engagements and the stand which it has taken in these matters.

It is true this protocol adopted at Geneva has been stalled in the Senate and has not been passed upon. In the meantime, contrary to the recommendations of President Coolidge, contrary to all these treaties, the Chemical Warfare Service of the War Department is seeking in every way to enlarge our operations in the use of poisonous gas in warfare. I do not object to the maintenance of laboratories. I do not object to preparation in case another country should violate its agreements. We should be prepared, and it is to be noted that this treaty binds only those who are parties thereto. If an outside country, such as Russia or Turkey, should use poisonous gas, we would be justified in using it; but I am opposed to this constant enlargement of preparations for the use of gas in warfare.

There is a certain element—and it is not confined to the War and Navy Departments—constantly making its calculations on the idea that in a brief time we are going to be precipitated into war. I do not believe in this policy. I think we should have hope and faith that we will not be. "Trust in the Lord and keep the powder dry" is the right principle, but, nevertheless, I most emphatically deprecate this constant policy of increasing military and naval armament.

This particular provision pertains to an increase of $55,000 in the making of gas masks. The hearings are not altogether clear on this subject, but it appears we have a great store of gas masks already on hand.

What probability is there that we shall need gas masks in the next year or in the next two years? It appears from the testimony, at page 590 of the hearings, that there are 70,000 of these gas masks manufactured in 1921 and we have made since then or provided for 50,000 more. Fifty thousand are being made under the 1927–28 appropriations, and there is an additional 21,000 suggested by the Budget Bureau for the coming fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, making in all 71,000—7 for every 12 of our soldiers—and it is stated in the hearings on page 592, "They have a gas mask for every man in the Navy."

It also appears that under present plans if an emergency should arise we could manufacture 4,000 of these gas masks in a month, and that the number could be increased even to 8,000 per day in 60 days.

Disregarding the recommendation of the Budget Bureau, which has very great difficulty in keeping down the very aggressive advocacy by the Army and the Navy of additional appropriations for war, this bill adds $55,000 and makes provision for 3,667 additional gas masks.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield for a question?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If I understand it correctly, the amendment of the gentleman is leveled simply at the manufacture of the gas masks.

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It does not go to the development of gas itself?

Mr. BURTON. No. As I have stated, I believe we should maintain our laboratories, that we should maintain a certain amount of material, so that in the event of war—quite improbable, I think—we would be prepared to use poisonous gas, an article which we would not use, I believe, on our own initiative, but to use it against another country which, in violation of what has been regarded as the rules of humanity, might employ it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But what impresses me is that the gentleman is striking at the only defensive feature that there is in this item.

Mr. BURTON. The fact of the matter is——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. We can not say that the other nations shall not use gas, and yet the gentleman proposes to take away part of our protection in the event they do.

Mr. BURTON. It is a part of a general program which has been very manifest in the Chemical Division of the Army to disregard the instructions given to our delegation at Geneva, to disregard the record of this country in its treaties. They have issued a deal of propaganda in regard to it. There is an organization known as the National Association for Chemical Defense, and this is but part of a general plan for the expansion of what I regard as not only an inhumane method of warfare—there may be some difference of opinion about that—some seem to think, as I stated a year ago, that its use in warfare, whether against hospitals or against individuals, is about like confetti throwing at a wedding, and they believe it is a very fine thing, but I do not believe so. But whatever may be true about that, the uniform course of our Government has been to repress, to forbid, to prohibit the use of poisonous gas. This addition is but a part of a program to ignore this policy of the Government, to go contrary to our action in every international conference, and even though it may be merely for gas masks, it is part of a general plan.

I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee, in addition, we have already tens of thousands of these gas masks available—30,000, 20,000, plus 21,000—that would be either manufactured or in process of manufacture—71,000 in all under the Budget estimate, and this provides for an additional number.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, of course I agree with the gentleman from Ohio that our treaty obligations should be scrupulously observed. But I do not quite understand how the manufacture of protective devices so that our forces can be protected in the event that other nations do not observe the treaty obligations or in the event that we should have difficulty with some nation not a party to any treaty can be a violation of the treaty on our part.

Whether the masks provided for in this bill are needed presents another question. I assume that they are, in the opinion of the War Department, else they would not be cared for by the Budget and brought in by the committee on this bill.

One thing is quite certain, if we should unfortunately get ourselves or be gotten into a situation where we needed gas masks we are going to need them right then and will not have time to wait for them to be manufactured. A gas mask is like a knife in a fight—you want it immediately or it will be of no benefit.

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. We have a capacity to manufacture 40,000 a month.

Mr. COLLINS. Two hundred thousand a month.

Mr. BURTON. And it can be enlarged to 8,000 a day; the provision is made for the manufacture of 71,000 in legislation already adopted.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is to reduce the number of gas masks; in other words, it is to leave the figures in the bill just as the Budget fixed them and just as the Budget sent this item to the committee. The committee saw fit to raise the number of gas masks to be manufactured and stored.

We have a government-owned plant now that in 60 days can manufacture 8,000 gas masks a day, or 200,000 a month.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. How long do the gas masks last when not in service?

Mr. COLLINS. Five years; they store them in hermetically sealed tin boxes, and they will last between 5 and 10 years.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. How many of them have they on hand?

Mr. COLLINS. Captain Walton testified that 70,000 useful gas masks that were made in 1921 are on hand. Between 1921 and 1927 none were made, and the appropriations for 1927, 1928, and 1929 will provide for 71,000 more masks. We will have then a total of 141,000 gas masks.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Why should not we have them if they are necessary for defense?

Mr. COLLINS. I will answer the gentleman as General Williams answered a similar question about a reserve of automobiles. Some one suggested that perhaps it would be a wise thing to buy a lot of automobiles and store them in warehouses for war purposes. General Williams answered that it would be foolish, utter folly for a country that manufactured 80 per cent of the automobiles of the world to manufacture and store automobiles for an emergency.

What is the sense of storing gas masks when they can be manufactured faster than you can get the men to put them on? [Applause.] It is utter folly; it is just a waste of $55,000; and that is all there is to it. If the gentleman were a director of a corporation and had this question before him, as a business man he would not waste a minute in deciding it against the extra masks.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Would the gentleman like to go into a battle without a gas mask?

Mr. COLLINS. Oh, that is not the question.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I ask the gentleman whether he would like to go into battle where there was a possibility that he might need a gas mask without one?

Mr. COLLINS. That is not the question. General Fries testified that we were ahead of the rest of the world in the quantity of gas masks manufactured. He wants to manufacture and store 450,000 more than we have now, where they will either deteriorate or become obsolete, probably both. He pointed out improvements that were made during the last year. These improvements are constantly going on. Why the necessity of manufacturing and storing large numbers of them when improvements are constantly made in effectiveness?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, this appears to me to be a rather important problem. Unfortunately, I was not present when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] made the first part of his statement. As I came into the Hall he was making the argument, at least by inference, that this appropriation for the manufacture of these additional gas masks was in some way violating, if not the letter, at least the spirit of our international obligations on this question. I ask the gentleman from Ohio briefly to state just what our obligation is in that particular, if any?

Mr. BURTON. I would not say that it is violating the letter. I would say that it is violating the spirit. In every negotiation with any other country in which we have engaged, beginning in 1921, we have sought to bring into effect the absolute prohibition of the use of poison gas.

The Chemical Warfare Bureau of the War Department has been working the other way, to increase the equipment for chemical warfare and the use of poisonous gases. I repeat what I must repeat, because the gentleman was not here, that I did not object at all to the maintenance of laboratories or a reasonable supply of poisonous gas or a reasonable supply of gas masks, but when you press it to the extent it is proposed you violate the spirit of our agreements and you violate the letter of treaties in which we have taken part.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman in his statement further observed that this action was in contravention of the instruction that the delegation from America received when it went to the Geneva conference.

Mr. BURTON. I did not say that. The instructions given to the delegation sent by the United States to the Geneva conference of 1925—and the gentleman should not confuse that with the conference of 1927—a conference for the control of international traffic in arms, was to secure a provision prohibiting the shipment between nations of asphyxiating or poisonous gases.

Mr. BANKHEAD. By whom was that instruction given?

Mr. BURTON. It was given to the commission of the United States, of which I was the chairman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. By the President?

Mr. BURTON. By the Secretary of State, after consultation with the President. That was found to be objectionable, in that the minor countries could not manufacture a supply, and if they were forbidden to import they would be at a disadvantage. It was changed so as to embody in a protocol an absolute prohibition of the use of asphyxiating gases. There was extended cabling between the delegation at Geneva and the President and the Secretary of State. That change was approved, a drastic, absolute prohibition of the use of asphyxiating gases in warfare. Following our lead—and that is an important part of it, because America desired it—the other nations joined enthusiastically in the protocol—France, England, Germany, Japan, and others.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, that is the information that I desired to secure from the gentleman. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, and if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] will give heed, I do it for the purpose of eliciting information from him. I understood the gentleman to say that America had taken the lead in this prohibition of poisonous gases. Am I correct or not in that statement?

Mr. BURTON. I would say that it is true if you do not go back historically to 1899, the First Hague Conference. The United States did not then take the lead. Under the advice of Admiral Mahan and, I think, General Crozier, who were somewhat skeptical in regard to it, we did not take the lead. Beginning in 1921 the United States did take the lead.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But the gentleman will concede that at The Hague Conference in 1899 the United States did not subscribe to the prohibition of the use of poisonous gases, although Germany and other nations of great military equipment for warfare did enter into a treaty for the disuse of such gas. On that occasion America stood out almost alone in behalf of the use of poisonous gases.

Mr. BURTON. That was on the ground that the question had not been sufficiently considered.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It was on the ground that our civil representatives, if I may so designate them, I think Doctor White and Mr. Choate and others, left the matter entirely to Admiral Mahan and General Crozier.

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Of course, that was our responsibility.

Mr. BURTON. However, I must emphasize that at the beginning of 1921 there was an entirely different attitude.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I understood the gentleman to say that we took the lead in the matter, and I wanted to learn when that lead commenced.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, this is not an item in the bill to become unduly alarmed about. It appropriates the same amount of money that was carried for Chemical Warfare Service in the 1928 bill. We are not going to spend as much money under this appropriation for chemical warfare work as we are spending this fiscal year. While this bill carries the same amount as the 1928 bill, we are going to spend more for repair of buildings at Edgewood Arsenal. Less money is provided for chemical warfare work than in the 1928 bill.

The situation is simply this: The Budget recommended funds for the manufacture in 1929 of 21,000 gas masks. Last year we provided in the 1928 bill for 30,000 gas masks.

The committee increased the Budget estimate by $55,000, which would provide for the manufacture of 24,667 gas masks for the Army. Gentlemen, that is a very modest provision. You have been told here that we can produce them at the rate of 200,000 a month. It is true that we can reach a production of 200,000 per month in 60 days, but in the beginning our production will be only 4,000 a month. In 60 days we can reach a production of 200,000; but in order to reach this production we must keep our plant in good working condition. We must have persons who are trained in the manufacture of these complicated devices. So this provision of the bill is a very modest one. This does not violate any treaty. It violates no obligation. It is simply a modest defensive measure, and the money which the committee recommends in addition to the Budget estimate is strictly for defensive purposes.

We are carrying on experimental work in the laboratory at Edgewood Arsenal. This is in exact accord with the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] to the effect that he has no reasonable objection to defense in the event that other nations use gas. As a matter of fact, other nations are going far beyond what we are doing in this country in chemical warfare and in preparation for the use of poisonous gases and in the manufacture of gas masks and other defensive apparatus. This is a small appropriation for defensive purposes. It is true that we have 70,000 gas masks at this time, but if we were to engage in war we would in a short time have to mobilize a million men, and how far would our present supply of gas masks go?

Mr. TABER. Is it not a fact that practically all our supply of gas masks is now outside of continental United States?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Are they in Nicaragua?

Mr. BARBOUR. This is for the Army. It is the Navy that is in Nicaragua.

Mr. COLLINS. Can the gentleman tell us where they are?

Mr. BARBOUR. Most of them are at Panama, in Hawaii, and in the Philippines.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Does not the gentleman think we should have some of them in the House?

Mr. BARBOUR. I think that might be well. [Laughter.]

Mr. COLLINS. It is stated that there are 10,000 stored in the United States, and then there are some in process of manufacture.

Mr. BARBOUR. Practically all of our reserve is at the overseas posts.

Mr. MANLOVE The gentleman from Texas facetiously remarked that some of these gas masks ought to be in the House. I submit that this gas is not dangerous. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. May I have one minute more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARBOUR. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] struck the keynote of this whole proposition. This is only a modest appropriation for defensive purposes and it is not extending offensive work at all.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Ten for a company would not be enough. We have to have at least one for each man in a company?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MICHENER). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, may we have a division?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 21, noes 70.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY

PAY OF MILITARY ACADEMY

Permanent establishment: For eight professors, $30,506; chaplain, $4,000; constructing quartermaster, in addition to his regular pay, $1,000; additional pay of professors and officers for length of service, $11,750; subsistence allowance of professors and officers, $3,942; in all, $51,192.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the following words in line 15 on page 49: "In addition to his regular pay, $1,000." I make the point of order because that language is in violation of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California desire to be heard? Can the gentleman from California cite an authority of law?

Mr. BARBOUR. What is the language objected to?

The CHAIRMAN. Page 49, line 15, "In addition to his regular pay, $1,000."

Mr. BARBOUR. Would not that go also to the words "constructing quartermaster"? I think the point of order, if made, should be directed to all of the language relative to the constructing quartermaster.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It has been carried in the bill every year, has it not?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes; for about 20 years.

Mr. COLLINS. I make the point of order against the language, "constructing quartermaster, in addition to his regular pay, $1,000."

Mr. BARBOUR. Is this an amendment?

Mr. COLLINS. No; it is a point of order.

Mr. BARBOUR. It has been carried in the appropriation bills for 20 years, but the point of order is good.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I want to take this opportunity to call the attention of the House to the methods employed by the recruiting service enticing young men to enter the service. The Army has recruiting offices scattered throughout my city, with large signs indicating every day in the Army like a Sunday in the city, illustrations of the Tropics, and everything that goes with them; and these recruiting officers make statements to the boys far different from the actual conditions prevailing in the Army. Only recently this poster [indicating] was displayed in New York City. My secretary saw it on Fourteenth Street, and I investigated the reason of the poster and what the recruiting officers were doing with it.

It said:

See Dress Parade, a Donald Crisp production. A story of West Point, Pathe Exchange (Inc.), distributors. Produced by De Mille Pictures Corporation. Duty, Honor, Country.

Then it said:

Do you want to go to West Point? Ask recruiting officer.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I would remind my friend from New York that enlisted men do have an opportunity to go to West Point from the Army.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will come to that. These posters were displayed on the stand which the recruiting officer has. The gentleman from Texas observes that they have a chance to go to West Point from the Army, but there are about how many appointments a year from the Army?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I think it is 20, or thereabout.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. From the whole Army?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I think so.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. And I dare say that if the recruiting officer was asked about that he would give the correct information. At least it would be his duty to do so.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will come to that.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. General Winans testified before the committee that there are: Senatorial appointments, 192 cadets; congressional appointments, 870 cadets; and from the Regular Army, 90.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Ninety appointments from the United States Army throughout the whole United States. We have 100,000 men in the Army, and you can figure the average. Not 1 boy in 10,000 will ever have a chance to go to West Point. Besides that, the recruiting officers of the Army were used to advertise a moving picture.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. That 90 is not every year. There are 90 in the academy at one time.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. A four-year course; so you divide that by four and will find that 1 boy in 25,000 would have a chance to go to West Point.

A youngster did go to a recruiting officer; and he was told, "Why, certainly, we will send you to West Point." This boy had only two years of high school, and he told that to the recruiting officer. The recruiting officer told boys I sent up to him that it was not necessary to go to a politician. He said they did not have to go to a Congressman, but all they had to do was to enlist in the Army for three years and they would send them to West Point.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. I just want to say that during the last three or four years three young men from my own district have gone into the United States Naval Academy from the enlisted service of the Navy and Marine Corps.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is all right. There is nothing wrong about that; but they have the great advantage of having a Representative who is in a key position on the floor of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks that has any influence. I do not think it has.

Mr. KNUTSON. It has not mitigated against them in any way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Here is a specific case in New York of a young man, a graduate of the high school, who went to the recruiting office and enlisted for three years. He was examined physically at the time. The recruiting officer in New York sent photographs of this young boy being sworn in. He was of Italian parentage, and the recruiting officer sent photographs of his being sworn in to local foreign papers in New York. This boy enlisted, and when he applied a year later for his appointment to West Point they found he had defective vision and could not qualify. He had the same vision at the time he enlisted. I brought this to the attention of the War Department, and this boy had to pay $125 to buy his discharge. He did that after he found that his eyesight was defective, but he enlisted on the express and direct promise that he would be sent to West Point, and that statement was sent by the recruiting officer in New York to the local papers.

When I discovered this poster I immediately sent a photostatic copy of it to the War Department. The next morning I got a telephone call. One of the boys who served with me in the Army drew this picture. How did he know I had made a kick? How did he know I had complained against this poster? He got a long-distance call from Washington. He said, "LAGUARDIA, there is $300,000 invested in this poster," and he said, "won't you withdraw your complaint until the picture is produced?" But I refused to withdraw it, and the Secretary of War did order the discontinuance of the poster. He did do that. When I called his attention to the poster the Secretary of War did withdraw the poster from this combined arrangement with the moving-picture company and the Army.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Who lost the $300,000?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The moving-picture company. There was an arrangement between the moving-picture company and the Army that the moving-picture company would furnish the posters and the Army would furnish the display.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Did the Army subscribe to any of the cost of the poster that was put out?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No. My understanding is they did not. The arrangement was that the producers would furnish the posters and the Army would furnish the display. You see, they have these recruiting officers stationed in cities at strategic points, where there is a great deal of traffic, and, of course, it is quite a display.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Was the Army to participate in any of the profits made by the moving-picture company?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No. In all fairness to the Secretary of War, he did discontinue the use of this poster immediately, and such posters were not displayed after that in New York City, and I assume they were not displayed anywhere else.

As I said, the young man I referred to was told by a recruiting officer, a commissioned officer, that he could enter West Point by enlisting for three years. A physical examination was made at the time of his enlistment, and as he passed the physical test then he assumed he would obtain his appointment to West Point. As a matter of fact, his vision was defective at the time of enlistment and it was certain at the time that the boy could not meet the West Point physical requirements. Yet, he was enlisted in the Army on willful misrepresentation made by the recruiting officer.

Young boys with only two years of high-school training enlist for three years with the hope of passing the entrance examination at West Point when it is out of the question and impossible.

I submit this practice is manifestly unfair. The United States Army in its recruiting should be required to use that same degree of honesty and business ethics that we expect in the ordinary dealings between men to-day. I have taken this time for the purpose of bringing this to your attention. I did not introduce any amendment to cut down the appropriation for three reasons—one I could not get by with it, and the other two are not important. [Laughter.]

But I do hope the Members will look into this matter in their own home towns and observe just how far the recruiting officers go and then bring pressure to bear on the War Department in order that this false propaganda, misrepresentation, and this enticing of young men may be stopped. [Applause.]

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. Is it not the fact that frequently boys are admitted to the Naval Academy when they have defective color perception which is congenital, and they are kept there two years before the department ever finds that defect? Is not this frequently the case?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There is no loss to the young man in such a case, because the boy has at least had two years of excellent education and training.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, there seems to be among the members of the committee a desire to laugh this charge out of court, so to speak. I am very glad the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has raised this question. He requested the Members of the House to look into the situation in their respective districts. Let me say to the gentleman and to the members of the committee I have been compelled to look into this situation in my district every day in the year, because of the dishonest and disgraceful actions of some of the recruiting officers in my section.

I realize full well that it is necessary to recruit young men into both the Army and the Navy, but I have no patience with a system that takes the fathers of families away from their families and puts them into the Army or the Navy, leaving defenseless and helpless children behind them to be supported by a mother who has all she can do, and more than she can do, to take care of her little brood of children. I have no sympathy with a system that recruits men who are under the influence of bootleg liquor into the service, leaving familes of 6, 8, 9, or 10 children behind, to be provided for from public charity.

Almost every day in the week and every week in the year I am compelled to bring such cases as I have described to the attention of both the Army and the Navy Department because of the disgraceful transactions by some of the recruiting officers in my district. I believe the time has arrived when the House should give expression, an emphatic expression, in condemnation of a situation of this kind.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. The gentleman does not find that the Army and Navy Departments countenance these things, does he?

Mr. CASEY. I think that is rather far-fetched. Of course, we can not tie it onto the officers so far as ordering the recruiting officers to do the thing is concerned, but nevertheless it is done, and it is done every day in the year. Notwithstanding that these cases are called to their attention every day, the departments know all about these, yet they do nothing to put a stop to it. Boys 14, 15, or 16 years of age are taken into the Army or the Navy in my district without the consent of their parents.

Mr. BARBOUR. They can be discharged from the service, under the law.

Mr. CASEY. Oh, yes; if the parents happen to find out where the boys are within six months. If they do not find out where they are within six months they have lost their rights, under the regulations of the departments, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. BARBOUR. I am not defending this policy.

Mr. CASEY. I hope not; nobody can defend it.

Mr. BARBOUR. I was simply asking the gentleman, as a matter of information, when he said he had taken these matters up with the department, whether the department had countenanced such things.

Mr. CASEY. Of course, if I can make out a case of violation of law, they discharge them; and if I can not, they keep them.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. The gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] has asked if these boys are not discharged when they have enlisted when they are under age; is it not true that under the regulations of the War Department these boys, when they are so discharged, are given a dishonorable discharge and are denied a pensionable status? [Cries of "No! no!"] That is the fact.

Mr. CASEY. That has not been my experience.

Mr. LOZIER. I have such a letter on my desk and I will ask leave to print in the RECORD in connection with my inquiry a statement from the Secretary of War, in which he states that is the policy of the War Department. Where there has been an enlistment under such conditions they are given a dishonorable discharge.

Mr. BARBOUR. How long ago was that?

Mr. LOZIER. In the last few days.

Mr. CASEY. Just a moment. I did not yield for a colloquy between the gentlemen. I want to make a statement myself about this matter.

Mothers have come to my home with tears in their eyes begging me to intercede in their behalf, stating that their boy, 14 or 15 years of age, is down at the recruiting station and is to be sent away the next morning. I tell them to go and make their appeal to the recruiting officer, because I can do nothing for them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASEY. I suggest to these poor mothers that they go to the recruiting officer and tell them that I have no influence with the recruiting officer, but must wait until the boys are inducted into the service and then I can take up their cases with The Adjutant General's office. These poor mothers have gone there and have pleaded with these men. They have told them, "My boy is only 15," and have been insulted by those officers saying, "How do we know you are telling the truth." A boy 14 or 15 years of age can tell the truth, in the estimation of these recruiting officers, but the word of the mother of that boy can not be taken by these men.

This is a shameful, disgraceful situation and is one that ought to be stopped. I feel very thankful to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] for bringing this matter up and giving me an opportunity to enter my protest, in my own feeble way, against the continuation of a situation that is disgraceful to the Government of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY. I will.

Mr. BLAND. Does not the gentleman think the situation would be partly cured if there was an amendment requiring the discharge of these boys at any time? At the present time it is limited to six months after the boy enlists, when if the application is made the department is required to discharge him at any time would not there be considerable relief?

Mr. CASEY. That would grant considerable relief, but it should also provide that any officer guilty of anything of that kind should be dishonorably discharged from the service. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I want to say to the gentleman that the time in the Navy is 60 days and not 6 months.

Mr. CASEY. Very often we find young men running away and enlisting and who are sent to the Philippine Islands or Porto Rico and the other outlying possessions, and their parents do not know where they are. They are looking all over the neighborhood, they have the police authorities looking for them, and finally the boy gets sick or homesick and then the parents are notified. They immediately make application for the discharge of the boy on account of dependency or his minority, and they are told that under the regulations the boy has served six months and can not be discharged. Then there is nothing the poor mother can do unless they beg, borrow, or steal $120 to have that boy discharged. The whole thing ought to be stopped. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, any Member who comes from a large city will appreciate the experience of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] with the recruiting officials of the Army and Navy. He is perfectly right when he says there is too much misrepresentation and that recruiting officials go too far in inducing young men from 14 to 18 years of age to enter the Army or Navy. I further desire to commend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY], and I will support an amendment, if he offers it, which will provide that any enlisted man or officer who knowingly enlists a boy under the legal age shall receive a dishonorable discharge.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House to another matter. In my city, St. Louis, during the war space was assigned to the United States Army and Navy on the ground surrounding the courthouse to erect tents to be used by the recruiting officials. An emergency existed and the officials of my city were doing everything possible to aid the Government. Tents were erected and have never been removed. I appealed to both the Army and Navy officers in St. Louis to remove this eyesore. The location was too desirable and they said they would recommend to their superior officers in Washington that every effort be made to retain it. Judging from the looks of the tents, they are the same ones that were placed there back in 1917. I am reminded of this by the discussion to-day, and I propose to ask both the Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy to abolish this branch office of the recruiting station in my city. The courthouse square of a large city is no place for tents.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], who spoke, referred to the poster which bore the words "Do you want to enter West Point?" used by the Army recruiting service, in condemning the practice of enticing young men into the Army, said that only one boy out of every 25,000 has such an opportunity through regular Army channels. I am proud to be the Representative of a district which furnished a young man, not because he enlisted in the Regular Army solely for the purpose of getting an opportunity to take the examination for West Point, but because he passed the examination and is in West Point to-day.

In November, 1926, Joseph F. Carroll, residing at 4741 Northland Avenue, St. Louis, Mo., which is in my congressional district, applied to me for an appointment to West Point. He was a fine-looking young man and had completed two years of study at the Washington University in St. Louis. I told him I would have no vacancy until 1928, but that I would try and secure him an appointment from one of the Senators from Missouri when I arrived in Washington. I suggested that he remind me by letter the first week in December. On my arrival in Washington I found the reminder on my desk. The Senators could offer Mr. Carroll no appointment. I then offered him an appointment to Annapolis. He replied that although he was eligible he would not consider an appointment to Annapolis. He added, "The life of a naval officer does not appeal to me as does that of an Army officer." Learning there was a chance, and a mighty slim chance at that, this young man, a university student, enlisted in the Regular Army in December, took the examination in March, passed, and is to-day a cadet at the United States Military Academy. I predict a long and successful Army career for him.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. This is really an important matter. I have had many cases during the past year, some of them of the most pathetic character.

The difficulty undoubtedly arises from the methods adopted by the recruiting officials, particularly the noncommissioned officers and privates sent out to induce young men to enlist. They are out to get men and they may not be overly careful regarding the statements made in appealing for recruits.

Take the case of a boy who was 8 years of age during the war. He remembers the flags flying, the bands playing, and the great enthusiasm for the service. Everybody was glorifying the soldier. Ten years have passed and he may be led to believe that the same conditions exist in the Army to-day. It will take but a few days to learn that he has made a mistake if he is not suited to Army life.

On the principal corner of my home city there are always two or three noncommissioned officers, soldierly in appearance and who know the story of the service perfectly. They attract the attention of boys and are quick to engage them in conversation. They tell them stories of seeing the world, and repeat other appealing inducements with which we are all familiar, and the boy is induced to enlist. One week is likely to cure him if he has no desire for the service other than a longing for travel.

I have a case on my desk right now where a young man makes affidavit that he enlisted with the understanding that he was to be a flying cadet. He swears that he enlisted with that understanding. The commanding officer appears to have agreed that he was to be made a flying cadet and recommended to the War Department that he be discharged because of misunderstanding or misrepresentation.

Enlistment is a contract, although the department appears to regard it as a matter for arbitrary decision on their part. I took it up with the War Department and found that in disregard of the recommendation of the commanding officer and of everybody involved, the War Department says that there is no just reason for discharging this man.

This question is a very serious matter to many poor families where the boy should be at home. A few years ago we passed a bill authorizing the War Department to make enlistments for one year in the hope that we might reduce the number of desertions, but it seems one-year enlistments are not accepted. We are sending scores of young men to Leavenworth and the other prisons, homesick and disillusioned boys who could not endure Army life, who finally, in a spirit of desperation, desert and are marked forever.

The constant fear of detection and arrest compels many to surrender, when Leavenworth or some other prison is the end. And we have another boy with a prison record. It is absolutely unfair. The gentleman from New York, who brought the subject to the attention of the House, did not go far enough.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPEAKS. Yes.

Mr. RAGON. As I understood the gentleman's statement about the young man, who had misrepresentations made to him, he stated a similar case to one which I had. I was advised then that the man to see was not The Adjutant General or the War Department, but his commanding officer. As I understand the gentleman, this boy's commanding officer says that he should be discharged.

Mr. SPEAKS. The boy makes an affidavit setting forth all of the circumstances and states that the commanding officer reported to higher authority the facts and recommended that he be discharged. If that is all true, the boy ought to be discharged.

Mr. RAGON. Does the commander of the corps area say that he should be or should not be?

Mr. SPEAKS. I have forgotten what the recommendation of the commander of the corps area is on this case, but his immediate commanding officer, who investigated the subject and whose recommendation ought to be accepted, stated that he should be discharged.

Mr. RAGON. I have exactly the same kind of a case. I had two brothers. One was discharged and they are holding the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

All of the money hereinbefore appropriated for pay of the Military Academy shall be disbursed and accounted for as pay of the Military Academy, and for that purpose shall constitute one fund.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of calling attention of my colleagues to some official correspondence to which I referred a few moments ago when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY] yielded to me while he was addressing the House. I do this in order to show the practice of the War Department in the past in refusing an honorable discharge to boys who enlisted in the Army while they were minors, and who in their eagerness to enter the service concealed the fact that they were under age, referring, of course, to minors who enlisted without the knowledge or consent of their parents. I have a specific case in mind.

James Hogan enlisted in the Army without the consent of his parents when he was 18 years of age. On the application of his mother he was released, but was not given an honorable discharge, the War Department taking the position that inasmuch as he had concealed his age he was not entitled to an honorable discharge. While in the service he contracted disabilities which, under ordinary circumstances, would have given him a pensionable status. Applying for a pension his claim was rejected on the alleged grounds that "his service was not honorable," although he was guilty of no act while in the service that would prevent him from receiving an honorable discharge.

The refusal to give him an honorable discharge was based solely on the fact that at the time of his enlistment he had concealed his true age. He was not conscious of having in any way violated any military regulation or been guilty of any misconduct while in the service. In order to ascertain why and how his service had not been honorable, I addressed a communication to The Adjutant General requesting specific information as to any act of misconduct of which this soldier had been guilty while in the service of his country, and in due course I received a reply in words and figures as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, January 28, 1928.

Hon. RALPH F. LOZIER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. LOZIER: I have your letter of January 21, 1928, in which, referring to the case of James Hogan, Company H, Sixth United States Infantry, you desire to know why he does not have a pensionable status under the general pension laws.

The records of my office show that James Hogan enlisted May 26, 1870, at Fort Gibson, Ind. T., at which time he stated his age to be 21 years. He was assigned to Company H, Sixth United States Infantry, and was discharged from service October 18, 1871, at Camp Supply, Ind. T., as a private pursuant to paragraph 2, War Department Special Order No. 388, dated October 3, 1871. This discharge was brought about through an application filed by the mother of the soldier for his discharge; his mother testified that he was born November 5, 1853, and was, therefore, under 18 years of age at enlistment, and that he had enlisted without her knowledge or consent. Her application for the discharge of James Hogan was approved, and there was issued the War Department special order above mentioned, which reads as follows:

"Pvt. James Hogan, Company H, Sixth Infantry, now with his command, will be discharged the service of the United States, provided there be no impediment as desertion, etc., upon receipt of this order at the place where he may be serving. This soldier is entitled to pay, etc., only under paragraph 1371, Revised United States Army Regulations of 1863."

Paragraph 1371, above cited, reads as follows:

"1371. Every enlisted man discharged as a minor, or for other cause involving fraud on his part in the enlistment, or discharged by the civil authority, shall forfeit all pay and allowances due at the time of the discharge, and shall not receive any final statements."

It has been the practice of the department for many years to consider soldiers who were discharged from the service on account of minority concealed at enlistment or for other cause involving fraud at enlistment as not honorably discharged, and the War Department holds that the discharge from service on October 18, 1871, of James Hogan, Company H, Sixth United States Infantry, was not honorable. Of this holding, the Commissioner of Pensions has been informed, and it is presumed that the rejection of James Hogan's application for a pension is due to this holding of the War Department. However, as the Commissioner of Pensions is the official charged by law with the administration of the pension laws, your letter has this date been forwarded to the commissioner, who will doubtless give you full information in regard to the action of the Pension Bureau in the case of James Hogan at an early date.

Very respectfully,

LUTZ WAHL,
Major General, The Adjutant General.

It will be observed that the War Department withheld an honorable discharge from this young man because he, in his eagerness to enter the military service of his country, concealed his true age. The War Department does not contend that the soldier was guilty of any misconduct or that he either in letter or spirit violated any regulations of the department or Army. This action is justified by the War Department under paragraph 1371 of the United States Army Regulations, quoted in the foregoing letter; but it will be observed that this paragraph does not, at least in spirit, justify the harsh procedure of denying an honorable discharge to a soldier who was guilty of no misconduct and who had contracted disabilities of a pensionable nature in the service.

I may add that the Congress of the United States, in recognition of his disabilities of service origin, granted this soldier a pension at the petty rate of $6 per month. Mr. Hogan's disabilities having become seriously aggravated, he applied to the Bureau of Pensions for an increase of pension under the act of March 3, 1927, believing that this act gave him title to such increase. His application was rejected by the Bureau of Pensions. I addressed a communication to the commissioner requesting the grounds upon which the claim was rejected, and in due course received a reply in words and figures as follows:

INVALID DIVISION,
January 9, 1928.

Hon. RALPH F. LOZIER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. LOZIER: In response to your inquiry relative to case I. C. 1288110 of James Hogan, whose address you do not give, and who served in Company H, Sixth United States Infantry, I have to advise you that Mr. Hogan is a pensioner under a special act of Congress at the rate of $6 per month. As the special act fixed the rate this bureau is without authority to increase that rate.

Mr. Hogan's claim under the act of March 3, 1927, was rejected September 26, 1927, on the ground that his discharge from Company H, Sixth United States Infantry, his only alleged service, on October 18, 1871, was not honorable, as shown by a report from the records of the War Department.

Very truly yours,

WINFIELD SCOTT, Commissioner.

The records of the Pension Bureau will show many cases where pensions have been denied in meritorious cases, where the disabilities were of service origin, and where the soldier was guilty of no misconduct while in the service, the rejection of the claim being solely on the ground that the soldier had concealed his minority at the time of the enlistment; and many deserving ex-soldiers are now laboring under this undeserved odium.

In view of the attitude of the War Department in withholding an honorable discharge in cases of this character, I am not disposed to criticize the action of the Commissioner of Pensions, because he can only grant pensions when the requisite service is shown and claimant has received an honorable discharge. The trouble and injustice in cases of this character result from adoption of a harsh Army regulation, which denies an honorable discharge to a soldier who concealed his minority at the date of his enlistment, although he may have faithfully served his country and contracted disabilities in the service which afterwards destroyed or materially reduced his capacity to earn a livelihood.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. Yes.

Mr. TABER. That was an 1871 enlistment, long before the statute was passed providing for a discharge upon the request of the boys' parents.

Mr. LOZIER. The point I make is that there has for many years been in force in the War Department a hard and fast regulation which denied an honorable discharge to a soldier who was a minor and who had misrepresented his age at the time of enlistment.

In this connection I call your attention to the several acts of Congress which have, in part, corrected this unjust situation. The act of February 12, 1925 (Code of Laws of the United States, title 10, sec. 653, p. 194), provides for the discharge from the Army of boys who are under age and who enlisted without the written consent of parent or guardian, upon application for discharge by the parent or guardian presented to the Secretary of War within six months after the date of enlistment, but this provision only applies to men enlisted after July 1, 1925. It is not retroactive and does not cover the case of any boy who enlisted before July 1, 1925, except for two short periods covered by the Spanish-American, Philippine, Boxer, and World Wars. This provision of February 12, 1925, if I remember correctly, was added to a War Department appropriation bill and enacted in order to force the War Department to give an honorable discharge in all cases where a soldier was released from the service on account of his being a minor and where his true age was concealed and he enlisted without the written consent of parent or guardian. This law, of course, covers cases where the enlistments were after July 1, 1925, but affords no relief where the enlistments were prior to July 1, 1925.

The act of March 16, 1926 (Code of Laws of the United States, title 10, sec. 654), grants an honorable discharge in cases of this character where the enlistment was between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, which covered the World War period. But this law was not enacted until nearly eight years after the World War ended.

By the act of January 5, 1927 (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 44, pt. 2, p. 932; Public Act No. 536), soldiers discharged for misrepresenting age on enlistment shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service—if such military service otherwise was such as would have entitled them to an honorable discharge—but that act only applied to soldiers who enlisted between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, being the period covered by the Spanish-American War, the Philippine insurrection, and the Boxer uprising. It will be observed that these boys who served in these wars rested under a discharge that was not honorable for 25 years, notwithstanding their courage and partiotism in line of duty in those wars, in which they carried Old Glory to victory in two hemispheres.

Now, let us see during what period in the last 30 years honorable discharges have been given to or provided for boys who enlisted under age and without the written consent of parent or guardian, and where the true age was concealed at the date of enlistment:

(a) Between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, about four years covering the Spanish-American War, the Philippine insurrection, and the Boxer uprising.

(b) April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, a period of about 19 months during the World War.

(c) All enlistments after July 1, 1925.

In other words, these three acts cover approximately 8 years in the last 30 years. That is to say, Congress has granted or compelled the granting of an honorable discharge in cases of this character in enlistments covering eight years since 1898 and has left the odium of a discharge which was not honorable on boys who enlisted under the same circumstances during the other 22 years of the last 30-year period.

Moreover, it was the Congress of the United States and not the War Department that gave to these boys an honorable discharge.

It is a well-known fact that many young boys who enlist are anxious for military service and conceal the fact that they are under age, believing that they would be denied enlistment if their correct age was known. While this practice is to be condemned and should never be encouraged, nevertheless the boys who enlist under these conditions should not be denied an honorable discharge if their service was honorable and if, during such service, they were guilty of no improper conduct. Recruiting officers frequently know or have every reason to believe that many boys applying for enlistment are under age, but in order to get recruits for the Army they shut their eyes to the facts and encourage boys to enlist in spite of the obvious fact that their appearance indicates that they are minors.

My purpose in participating in this discussion is to call attention to the fact that even under existing laws many boys who enlisted under the conditions to which we have referred are still living under the odium of a discharge that was not honorable, although they were guilty of no misconduct and served faithfully in the ranks, and some of them contracted disabilities in the service for which they should be pensioned, but they are denied a pensionable status because they concealed their minority at the time of their enlistment. By three acts Congress has attempted to correct this situation, but these three acts only cover enlistments for approximately one-fourth of the time in the last 30 years. Obviously these acts afford relief in a very large proportion of cases because they cover the several war periods, but hundreds, or possibly thousands, of boys who enlisted in the Army in peace times or during the Indian wars, and who were disabled in the service, have not been granted the relief to which they are justly entitled and are denied a pensionable status. This injustice can only be corrected by an act which will grant an honorable discharge to all boys who enlisted in the Army under the conditions we are discussing, and this relief should not be confined to the few classes covered by the three acts to which I have referred.

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. Under the present law where a minor enlists representing his age to be 21, if his parents make application for his discharge within six months after his enlistment, he is given an honorable discharge just the same as any other soldier is given an honorable discharge, unless he has done something that is dishonorable. That is the law. I just called up The Adjutant General's Department to find out whether there had been, as the gentleman from Missouri states, a dishonorable discharge. The minor when discharged receives the same kind of a discharge as any other soldier.

The Clerk read as follows:

For travel of officers and noncommisisoned officers of the Regular Army in connection with the National Guard, $340,000: Provided, That not to exceed $2,000 of this sum shall be expended for travel of officers of the War Department General Staff in connection with the National Guard.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to propound an inquiry to the chairman of the subcommittee. I notice on page 51, line 10, reference is made to section 3648 of the Revised Statutes. I am wondering what that means. We now have a United States Code, to which ordinarily reference is made when a statute is cited, or, on the other hand, there may be a reference to the Statutes at Large.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, we went into that matter quite fully last Friday during consideration of the earlier sections of the bill. I think the general opinion at that time was that, as we had started this year's appropriation bills with references such as this, it might be advisable to wait until the appropriation bills all start again before making a change, and have them all alike in that regard.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. What is meant by "Revised Statutes," as the term is used in this bill?

Mr. BARBOUR. I think the usual interpretation should be given to the citation.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The Revised Statutes, as we understand, are the statutes compiled about 1874. The compilation was perhaps not completed until 1878. That has been superseded by the code now in effect, and it seems to me that the reference ought to be to the present codification.

Mr. BARBOUR. I think if we should cite the code it would probably make it easier to refer to this citation. We went into that quite fully, as I say, under one of the earlier sections of the bill, and it was suggested at that time that as some of the appropriation bills had already passed with this form of citation it might be advisable to go on with the rest of them, so that the form of the bills this year would be the same. In another year that matter would be given full consideration.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Nevertheless, the citation might be regarded as uncertain and misleading. I do not propose to make any motion. I was simply inquiring of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ORGANIZED RESERVES

Officers' Reserve Corps: For pay and allowances of members of the Officers' Reserve Corps on active duty for not exceeding 15 days' training, $2,125,600.

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WURZBACH: Page 55, line 4, after the word "training," strike out "$2,125,600" and insert "$2,657,000."

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Chairman, this is one amendment that ought to be adopted. The purpose of this amendment is to increase the appropriation made for the Organized Reserve, so that instead of providing for the training of 16,000 officers for 15 days for the fiscal year 1929, 20,000 officers instead will be provided for.

The Organized Reserve consists of 110,000 officers. More than one-half of those officers were emergency officers. Many of them served overseas during the World War. Every year the enrollment of Organized Reserves has increased. About 5,000 of them graduate from the Reserve Officers' Training Corps and the citizens' military training camps each year.

I have read the report of the committee and also have gone carefully over the hearings. In the report the Committee on Appropriations admits that it is very conjectural as to how many officers will offer for training. On page 17 of the printed report it is stated:

The question as to the number of officers for whom 15-day training should be provided is not easy to solve, because some of the factors are too conjectural. We have been proceeding heretofore on giving 15-day training every third year. If this were rigidly adhered to, eliminating reserve officers serving also with the National Guard, officers affiliated with the procurement or supply branches, and officers whose engagements or inclinations prevent or discount consideration, the Budget figure of 15,125 might not be far out of the way. The War Department is planning now to get a better hold of the situation, so as to reduce or eliminate the conjectural factors in shaping the 1930 estimates.

They also state in their report:

We have been proceeding heretofore in giving 15 days' training every third year.

Now, there are 110,000 officers of the reserve enrolled. There are at least 60,000 of these officers who are on the active list, and who would accept training at least once in every three years. So that, under the plan adopted by the Committee on Appropriations of a three-year training period, and taking the minimum of 60,000 officers of the reserve, 20,000 officers is the minimum that ought to be provided for each year.

Now, I think it ought to be understood by the membership of the House that these officers of the Organized Reserve are not coming here as beggars begging for something to benefit themselves, but they come only as they came in 1917 and 1918, begging for the opportunity to serve and to render similar patriotic service in these days of peace that they so cheerfully offered during those strenuous days 10 years ago. The Organized Reserve has increased in numbers from 76,000 in 1923 to 110,000 in 1927. Notwithstanding this steady growth, instead of making increased appropriations for the training of these men for two weeks each year, Congress is apparently seeking to cut down the appropriations each year and permitting smaller numbers to train each year.

Mr. MANLOVE. Have we any precedent to go by? This is a matter of which I am not very well informed. We have had these training camps before. How many officers availed themselves of it previously?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. WURZBACH. There has not been a year during the last three or four years when officers applying for training have not been turned down.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I would like to ask the gentleman what these officers do? Are they paid during the training, two weeks, for that time?

Mr. WURZBACH. They are paid for subsistence and mileage; 4 cents a mile for traveling expenses, whereas the officers in the Regular Establishment and other reserve officers training for more than the 15-day period receive 8 cents a mile. I am glad the gentleman asked me the question. It costs only $132.85 for the training of one of these reserve officers.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does that include the pay?

Mr. WURZBACH. I think it does.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. WURZBACH. I do not think I am. I want to read a few extracts from the hearings.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WURZBACH. I decline to yield at this time. My time is limited.

Mr. SNELL. I will get the gentleman more time.

Mr. WURZBACH. Very well.

Mr. SNELL. I think it would be well to inform the House exactly what these officers get. I understand they get a certain compensation for their time. I would like to ask the gentleman to tell the House just exactly what they get.

Mr. WURZBACH. I do not know exactly what they get, but I consider that immaterial, and I think the gentleman from New York will agree when I say that it costs only $132.85 for each officer trainee for the entire two weeks.

Mr. TABER. That is just their pay.

Mr. LINTHICUM. They get full pay for the time they serve, as I understand.

Mr. SNELL. There seems to be a difference of opinion. We should have exact information on this.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WURZBACH. Yes.

Mr. COLLINS. I understand the increase proposed by the gentleman would be, pay allowances, $531,400; mileage, $89,000; establishment and maintenance of camps, $75,200; or a total of $695,600.

Mr. SNELL. I would like to know what the pay of these officers is during training and what other allowances are given to them.

Mr. WURZBACH. I would like to have gentlemen of the committee answer that question.

Mr. BARBOUR. I will answer it. At page 834 of the hearings Major Wainwright was asked this question:

> Will you tell us what the allowances are that they receive in addition to mileage?

To which he answered:

> Yes, sir. They receive rental allowances of the grade and subsistence allowance of the grade.

Then he said:

> The average per capita pay of the 15-day period is $132.85, including allowances.

That is the average, including the allowances.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They are paid according to the rank they hold.

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes. A colonel would receive much more than a second lieutenant.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. These men are trained for a period of two weeks and receive a salary equal to the rank they hold while getting the training?

Mr. BARBOUR. That is it. But $132.85 is the average of all of them.

Mr. COLLINS. If you will take $531,400 and divide it by 4,000 it will give you approximately $133, which is the pay and allowance of each one of these men.

Mr. WURZBACH. Well, I said $132.85. The only difference between the information I just gave and that given by members of the subcommittee is 15 cents, and in my favor. Anyhow, the increase in this item would be $531,400; that is four thousand times $132.85.

I think it ought to be said that if only 16,000 of these officers offer for training then the amount of money asked for by way of increase would not be expended, and there is no harm done or money taken out of the United States Treasury by the adoption of my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, there should be a limit to this.

Mr. SNELL. I think the gentleman should have more time, because I took up some of his time. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. WURZBACH. Now, $531,000 need not necessarily be expended, and I hope it will not be expended, but the information I have—and I get my information from the hearings—is that in past years officers have been refused training on account of a lack of funds.

I am going to read from page 881 of the hearings, the testimony of Col. C. M. Penfield, member of the executive council of the New York State Reserve Officers' Association:

> I had applied for training several times in several years, and I had always received the answer that there were no funds. Being a member of the Reserve, I wanted to take some training. Through the friendship of one of the men in New York, I went on to see Colonel Bidmer, and although his applications were all filled and he had all the men he could take care of, he permitted me to go to the camp that summer, provided I paid my own way, my mess, etc., which I was glad to do. I had a wonderful experience.

And so on. I am in receipt of a telegram from Colonel Tuttle, of San Antonio, president of the public service company and one of the outstanding men of Texas. I asked him to ascertain how many in the Eighth Corps Area had been refused training. He said:

> One hundred and thirty-one officers denied training in year beginning July 1, 1926. Number denied in year beginning July 1, 1927, unobtainable, but believe it will greatly exceed previous year.

Colonel Bedeau, of New Jersey, says:

> In my own case I can not express too strongly the fact that many of us who have had World War experience, which is invaluable, are growing older and probably we will not again serve in the field. We must be supplemented by the younger men. It is hardly conceivable that these men will understand the situation unless they have some training, and not only training but contact with officers who have so served.

Gen. Roy Hoffman, of the State of Oklahoma, appeared before the committee and I wish every Member of the House could read what he said. General Hoffman commanded a division overseas. He was for 20 years with the National Guard, and he is one of the outstanding and most patriotic men in this country to-day. He said:

> After years of close observation and study of the question throughout the country, the association has in unanimity arrived at the conclusion that 20,000 is the least number of 15-day trainees that it is wise to train annually.

I have that same information from the American Legion, and they take exactly the same position.

I have always been a supporter of the Regular Establishment, but I believe I express the sentiment of the membership of this House when I say one of the chief foundations of national defense and security consists in the civilian part of our Army, the officers of the Organized Reserve, the Reserve Officers' Training Camp, and the citizens' military training camp. These men who served during the World War are willing to continue to serve, and they are willing to hand down their experiences to the men who are growing up. Five thousand Reserve Officers' Training Camp young men are turned out every year into the Organized Reserve, and if you are not going to give training to at least 20,000 each year, 20,000 out of a minimum of 60,000, you might just as well save the entire amount appropriated for those components and make no appropriation at all. The morale of the Organized Reserves will be seriously affected unless you adopt this amendment and permit 20,000 of those officers to attend the training camps. I think we could well be on the safe side by providing sufficient money for 20,000 to train if they choose to train, and if they do not choose to train, as I stated before, it means, and it ought to mean, that this $531,400 will remain in the Treasury.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I want to assure the House that the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the War Department gave very careful and sympathetic attention to this matter of training the Organized Reserves. I think it can be said that the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the War Department is very friendly to the Organized Reserves. I think this has been demonstrated by the action which the subcommittee took in preparing the bill.

The Budget recommended that we provide funds for training 15,125 trainees of the Organized Reserves. This committee took upon itself the responsibility of increasing this number to 16,000, an increase of 875 trainees. I think this is evidence, gentlemen, of the fact that this committee is not unfriendly to the Organized Reserves.

Last year funds were provided for training 16,382. The appropriation this year is for training 382 less than were trained last year. We went into this question with the greatest of care, and, as I say, with a feeling of the utmost friendship for the men in the Organized Reserves, who are giving their time, their energy, and their attention to the questions of national defense; but I say without fear of contradiction, there is not one word of testimony in the hearings that will warrant us in providing money for the training of 20,000 members of the Organized Reserves.

Bear with me for a moment. Let us consider the Organized Reserves. In the first place, it is a volunteer organization. You can not compel any man in the Organized Reserves to take training unless he sees fit to do so. You can not compel any officer of the Organized Reserves to keep up his studies during the year—to prepare himself for training unless he is willing to do such work. There are a large number of the 110,000 in the reserves who are admittedly not keeping up their work during the year, and it would be an unwarranted expenditure of money to send these men to the training camps.

The Organized Reserves have two kinds of training. The inactive training, so called, which is the home work, which they carry on at the meetings with the Regular Army officers who are assigned to Organized Reserves work. Their lessons are assigned to them and they meet so often in classes and groups and work out problems with the Regular Army officers and under their instruction. If a reserve officer will not do this work, if he will not keep up his studies during the year, then he is not qualified to go to one of these training camps and receive 100 per cent benefit from the work he would do there, and the United States Government is not justified in spending money to send such man to the training camp when he has not prepared himself to take the training.

Then we have the active training, the 14-day training, which is the training in question at the present time, sometimes called 15-day training, because the law provides it shall be not to exceed 15 days. As part of the active training we have the more than 15-day training at the service schools and with the Regular Army units.

Unless these officers keep up their inactive training they are not prepared to go to the camps and to the service schools and take the active training, and I submit this to you as a business proposition, without any feeling of prejudice, because we have no prejudice against the Reserves. We have demonstrated that we are the friends of the Organized Reserves in making the recommendations we have, and I submit to you that there is nothing before this committee or before this House that would justify us in sending 20,000 Organized Reserve officers to training camps next year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARBOUR. Our committee, in giving attention to this question, has been hampered by the fact we have been unable to get definite information. We have asked the War Department for information and have been told that the information is in the hands of the corps area commanders. Therefore we have asked the War Department to make a study of the Organized Reserves for next year, through the corps area commanders down to the Regular Army officers on duty with the Organized Reserve units, so that we can have some definite idea of the number of men who are conscientiously keeping up their work and upon the training of whom we would be justified in spending the taxpayers' money.

A preliminary survey of this kind has been made. Orders have gone from the Secretary of War that this study shall be made, and next year we will have the benefit of such study. A hurried, preliminary investigation along this line has already been made, and I have here a letter which I want to read to the Members of the House. I ask your attention to this letter, because it is very illuminating.

FEBRUARY 4, 1928.

Memorandum for the Hon. HENRY E. BARBOUR, House of Representatives

With reference to certain information requested by you concerning the number of reserve officers who were not pursuing training of any kind actively, the following information has been received by radio from corps area commanders and chiefs of branches:

Reports received indicate that in the fiscal year 1927 approximately 2,710 reserve officers were denied active-duty training due to lack of funds, and that inactive-duty flying was participated in by 960 reserve pilots. It is estimated that 16,522 reserve officers will have received active-duty training by the end of the fiscal year 1928. Reports indicate that 30,545 reserve officers are enrolled in conference courses and 31,340 in correspondence courses.

From the above figures the gross enrollment in inactive-duty training at the present time would appear to be 61,885. Because some reserve officers are pursuing both types, it is indicated that the total number of different individuals trained in this manner is in the neighborhood of 45,000. Experience also indicates that the probable percentage of those who are called to active-duty training without record of interest in either of the above forms of inactive training is approximately 12 per cent of the total of 16,885 active-duty trainees, or about 2,000.

Two thousand officers, according to this study, went to the training camps in the past year who were not properly prepared because they had not kept up their inactive training. That, I will say to my friend from Texas, is why, in all probability, some reserve officers were unable to attend the camps.

Mr. WURZBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. WURZBACH. There were about 2,700 applicants who were refused on account of lack of funds, and is not it fair to assume that the officers had some hint that there was inadequate funds, and therefore did not apply on that account?

Mr. BARBOUR. I do not know anything about the information they may have had.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Was there any suggestion coming from the reserve officers for reducing the pay and allowance?

Mr. BARBOUR. I have not heard of any. I do not suggest that. Now, I ask attention to the balance of this letter from Major Wainwright. Here is the meat of the whole proposition:

In other words, approximately 47,000 reserve officers are actively showing interest in the project of national defense.

From that 47,000 reserve officers comes every one whom we would be justified in training, because by this official statement the balance are not showing sufficient active interest in national defense. Now, Major Wainwright continues:

The strength of the Organized Reserves is 110,014; 8,451 of these are dual status officers who receive their training with the National Guard. This leaves us 101,563, of whom approximately 54,600 may be considered not actively engaged in any of the forms of training that are provided.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I will.

Mr. McKEOWN. Is there any reason given why the men did not take the inactive training?

Mr. BARBOUR. No; but you can not compel them. This is a volunteer organization. It is different from any other military organization we have. In the National Guard they are under orders, but in the Officers' Reserve they are not under orders, but can train or not, as they please.

Mr. McKEOWN. Could not the department make rules and regulations?

Mr. BARBOUR. It could, but could not compel obedience, because, as I say, it is a volunteer organization. The department could require that reserve officers keep up their inactive training, but this has not yet been done. Some of these officers are very conscientious. Some are valuable officers to the Government, and these ought to be trained. These officers should be trained as often as necessary. But nothing can justify us in spending money for training men who are not sufficiently interested to keep up their work.

Mr. McKEOWN. Can there not be some provision whereby the department can weed out these men?

Mr. BARBOUR. We have asked for this study to be made by the War Department, so that we will have all officers classified. As I recall, General Hoffman, president of the Reserve Officers' Association, says that it should be made.

It will be a good thing for the Congress, it will be a good thing for the War Department, and it will be a good thing for the Organized Reserves, because it will weed out those not sufficiently interested, and the men who are doing the work will be benefited by it, because they will not have to carry the others.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I will yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. HALE. Do I understand that 2,000 men who declined to keep up their home work received officers training and 2,700 officers who had kept up their work were refused training?

Mr. BARBOUR. No; nothing was said about the 2,700 as to whether they were qualified or not. Nothing was said about whether they had kept up their work.

Mr. HALE. How many of the 2,700 that were not trained were qualified?

Mr. BARBOUR. I have no information as to that.

Mr. HALE. And the question that arose in my mind further was whether those who were qualified, and ought to have the training, should be penalized by the admission of those who were not qualified.

Mr. BARBOUR. That is what we are trying to prevent.

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. WURZBACH. Is it not safe to assume that the 2,700 who were refused training were refused for the reason given in the communication, namely, because of lack of funds?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes; but at the same time we were training 2,000 and spending money on them that should not have been trained.

Mr. McSWAIN. Speaking of the 2,000 trained that had not taken the correspondence course, the fact that they were admitted to the training camps is not an imposition on their part. The corps area commander had to admit them, and he had the power to require the showing that they had carried on their home study before they were admitted to training, so that somebody in the Regular Establishment let somebody in who is not entitled to come in.

Mr. BARBOUR. That may be, but what I want to get at is to find out how many men we are justified in spending money on. I do not believe there is a man in the House who will say that we should spend an average of $132 on these men for two weeks just because they want to go to camp.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARBOUR. We are only justified in spending money on the men who are conscientious enough to keep up their work and fit themselves for this training, so that they will get 100 per cent benefit from the training and the Government will get 100 cents for every dollar it spends. I call attention to what the Secretary of War said. In speaking of the Budget recommendation to train 15,125 men, he stated:

> In the whole program, or taking it as a whole, we thought that was about all that should be applied to it.

That is, the money to train 15,125. Further on the Secretary said:

> Of course, I would like to train a few more men; but, taking it as a whole, we thought that was about right, for it is a rounded-out program.

Fifteen thousand one hundred and twenty-five trainees were recommended by the Secretary of War as the number for a well-rounded program. The committee has gone further than that and has provided for 16,000. That is our earnest, honest, conscientious recommendation to the House because we feel that with the showing made we would not be justified in recommending more.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. Is it the thought of the gentleman that with this further study the committee will determine on the number that is to be used every year, instead of having the Budget go to work and cut it down and cut it down as it has been doing?

Mr. BARBOUR. We will all know. The Budget will know, the War Department will know, the committee will know, and the Organized Reserves themselves will know, and it will be of benefit to all of us.

Mr. NEWTON. It seems to me that something of that kind, if it can be worked out as a policy, is what should be done.

Mr. BARBOUR. It is the only sensible thing to do.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to have a confidential chat with the House for a few minutes. Let us each take the other into his confidence for five minutes and see where we are, where we are going, when we are going, and how. Let us see whether it is necessary or possible to train everybody at the public expense, or whether there is a limit beyond which we should not go.

Just a little while ago we passed a tax bill. We were told by the Treasury Department that it was not safe to make a reduction exceeding $225,000,000. This House by its vote went beyond that figure and reduced the taxes by $290,000,000. It is a fair assumption that the House meant what it said, and wants that vote to be finally consummated into a tax reduction law. Perhaps there will be some addition made to it by the other body. Then what? Where are you going to get the money to do the things that everybody wants you to do?

Is everybody in the House afraid of a telegram? Should every man run when a telegram comes demanding that he shall vote for some additional expense? Why would it not be a good idea to stop and exercise our own judgment once in a while? Why should two or three propagandists for one or two of these activities have more influence than all of the House? Why should the House stampede when somebody sits in the gallery who has no other object than to promote the expense on the activity in which he is interested? Why should we let him dictate the policy when it should be dictated by the lawfully authorized representatives of the American people?

Should a telegram from John Jones, who lives in our district, frighten us simply because he is one of our constituents? What influence has he in the district? Not nearly as much as his telegram would indicate. He may think that he has a lot of influence, and, perhaps, he has, but I venture the suggestion that he is not as influential as the men who want expenses kept down and taxes reduced. I have at times had propagandists threaten to oppose me in the election if I did not accede to their demands.

I said, "That would be the one thing that I would like the best." I would like to take one or two of them out on the platform with me when I went to make a speech on the merits of the case pending before the people and expose them as looters of the Treasury.

What is it that we have before us? We have a proposal here to increase the number of men who will be trained in the Organized Reserve. What difference does it make whether we train 15,000 or 16,000 or 20,000? The only difference is this, the larger number you train the more it costs. This training has some value, but every year these men get less fit for military service. We reward them for their devotion to the military activities, but every man physically fit, in or out of the reserves, is called upon to defend the flag when the occasion arises. These men are not the only ones who want to defend the flag. All want to.

Now, how much money is there in this bill? There is $316,000,000 in direct appropriation and contract authorization for the military activities. How much money do you want to pay for the Army after having voted a bigger tax reduction than we can afford? How are you going to pay the bills? Somebody has got to pay them. The men on the farms, in coal mines, on railroads, and in all the other industries have to pay some of these bills. Do we want to put new burdens on them or do we want to release them from some of the burdens they are already carrying?

I tell you, gentlemen, that the time is coming when you can not afford to run away because some fellow sends you a telegram. That is about what it means. I have had five telegrams this week of that character. I had a telegram the other day from the Illinois Bankers' Association, in which they said they wanted me to vote for $10,000,000 again this year for the extermination of the corn borer; and I wired back and said, "We gave them $10,000,000 for 1928." Five millions of that were spent for machinery, some of which is now probably on the scrap heap. Four millions was paid to farmers for cleaning up their own premises. I am against that kind of expenditure, whether it is for the Army or for the Navy or for the farmer. What we ought to do is to take a sane view of all these situations.

Now, we are providing $316,000,000 for the Army. Do you want unreasonably to add more, or do you want to economize in decency in the expenditure of public money?

We have a flood-control proposal pending in committee. It will soon come up. Nobody knows, no man in the world can tell you, what it will cost. But if a bill before the Committee on Flood Control should by any chance be passed, the flood-control proposal to be disposed of soon will cost an unjustifiable and outrageous amount.

Now, I am in favor of flood-control legislation that is decent. I am in favor of doing everything that can be done in justice to relieve distress. I am in favor of maintaining a proper Army, and I am not in favor of listening to these people who are appealing for special appropriations, added to the Regular Establishment, in order that they may promote a political advantage. I hope the House will listen, and I hope it will act sanely, because, gentlemen, the responsibility is yours. The flood-control proposition is a serious question and has to be dealt with seriously. You can not pass it by, and you can not hand out to the Organized Reserves, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, the civilian military training camps, the National Guard, the rifle clubs, and to all these other institutions untold quantities of money and still meet the necessary obligations of the Government and reduce taxes at the same time.

Now, you say the people want these things. Well, you just try them when you go out among them and see whether they want them or not. You can go to any place in any district in the United States and express the courage that you ought to have to the people and ask them whether they want lavish use of public money, even for training reserve officers, and they will tell you no. These men, pressing for these increases, patriotic men, deserving men, are not the whole population of the United States, and they ought not to be given the whole right to say how much money Congress is going to spend. We are here to represent the American taxpayers.

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Not now.

Mr. WURZBACH. For just a question.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. WURZBACH. The gentleman no doubt is sensible of the fact that this organization is receiving less than one-half of 1 per cent of all the money appropriated for the national defense.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, they are not the national defense just now. They are in a reserve organization. The national defense is represented by the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, and a great many other elements, and not by the few men who are in the reserve, holding places in these corps areas and doing some of the politics of the Regular Army officers which they dare not do themselves. That is part of the story. I know that, for I have studied it.

While the reserves may be only getting a certain percentage, that is not the issue at all. The question is: What is the House going to do about it? Are you going to represent the taxpayers as such or, regardless of where the money comes from, are you going on in a reckless and extravagant way without knowing where the money will come from, or without caring, either? [Applause.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, there will be no dispute between any of the ladies and gentlemen of this House who support this amendment with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] on the general proposition of economy. I want to say to the Members of the House that I am not an officer of the Reserve Corps. When I was elected to this House, apprehending there was a constitutional as well as an actual conflict between those two interests, I resigned my commission in the Reserve Corps and have had absolutely nothing to do with it. But I want to say, ladies and gentlemen, that if we need a Regular Army, and we do, we need the Organized Reserves, too. The gentleman from Illinois is a distinguished, able, conscientious, and faithful public servant and I am not in dispute with him about his general propositions; but the argument he makes that this is a virtual waste of money because these reserve officers are getting older and older every year applies with equal and with even greater force to the officers of the Regular Army, because they are getting older at the same rate every year, and they are, perhaps, on an average older than the reserve officers.

We are putting into the coffers of the Regular Establishment not $500,000—not a half million dollars—but over $300,000,000. Three hundred million dollars is going into the Regular Establishment, with about 13,000 officers, and the gentleman who is for economy approves it; has approved it and approves it here to-day. Three hundred million dollars for the military activities of the Regular Army. Of course, not $399,000,000, because roughly speaking $99,000,000 is for the nonmilitary activities.

If there were not hovering in the minds of the people that at some time there will be an actual and physical armed conflict in which the life of this Nation will be involved, then I say we are absolutely throwing away and we are wasting, we are worse than wasting $300,000,000 of the people's money. However, hard-headed, common-sense people know we are not wasting it when it is used for the purpose of keeping reasonably prepared. The question is this: Where is the wise and reasonable and fair and practical way to spend a little more money to give more defense?

The distinguished chairman of the subcommittee has referred to the fact that only 47,000 out of the 110,000 Reserve Officers are carrying on their correspondence course at home. Well, instead of that being a disparaging fact, it is commendable. I say to you I think it is a very remarkable showing that so many men are carrying on this correspondence course for which they receive not one cent. In the evening, when other people, who are enjoying the protection these men are offering to give them when war breaks, if it should break—and if sure it never will break, then the whole thing is utter folly—when other people are going to the theaters or sitting around with their easy slippers on reading novels or playing cards, these men, after a hard day's work, are sitting down over their tables and working out problems and answering the interrogatories that have been sent out by the War Department. I say that for that work, for which they receive not one cent, they are entitled to the commendation of this Congress and of this country, because in these days it is a saddening fact that so few people are willing to do anything at all of a patriotic nature without being paid for it.

We have about 13,000 officers in the Regular Army. I submit and I believe that the records of every war this country has ever engaged in will support the statement that the civilian officer—man for man—which George Washington was—who comes in when the emergency breaks, renders as valuable service to his country as do the Regular Army officers themselves. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we have 110,000 of these officers. We have less than 22,500 who take the correspondence courses—about one-fifth of them, of the total number. Any one of the 110,000 can take the correspondence course, but less than 22,500 of them take it. So the actual active strength of this organization is little more than 22,500.

We have 16,000 that go to camp, and of these that go to camp 80 per cent or more take the correspondence course. So under no method of reasoning can you get over 25,000 or 30,000 active officers in this organization.

Throughout the hearings of this year and other years experts testify that we should train one-third of these men every year or that one man should have training every third year. So figuring the total number at between 25,000 and 30,000 the training of 16,000 this year will train them oftener than once every two years instead of once every third year, as is contemplated by the War Department.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Do the men who are actually taking this correspondence course have any difficulty in being admitted to this active training period every two years?

Mr. COLLINS. No, indeed. They could be trained oftener than once every two years with the number provided in this bill.

Mr. WURZBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

Mr. WURZBACH. Did not the gentleman just now state there were 26,000 taking the correspondence course?

Mr. COLLINS. No; I said less than 22,500.

Mr. WURZBACH. Well, 22,500——

Mr. COLLINS. But let me go on. We have 110,000 of these men. We could not use over 65,000 of them if we mobilized an army of 3,500,000 men. So what is the use of providing a top-heavy organization like this?

Men, we do not have to go wild simply because we are considering an Army appropriation bill. We might as well remain sensible human beings in spite of the fact that a War Department activity is under consideration.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman tell us how he arrives at the fact that only 65,000 of these men would be used?

Mr. COLLINS. This is the testimony of all of the War Department officials—all of them.

Mr. HOFFMAN. May I say, sir——

Mr. COLLINS. No; I must go on.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In addition to these officers being trained, there are all the National Guard officers and their training in camp at the expense of the Federal Government.

Mr. COLLINS. Sure. Let me go further. We are increasing the military appropriation items in this particular bill $20,000,000, approximately, over the same bill last year. Where is all this going to lead? If we will take the items in the deficiency bill this year, charged in our report principally to 1928, you will find that half of them at least should be charged properly to 1926, 1927, and to this year. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I speak from the standpoint of one who is opposed to a large standing army. If I had my way, I would reduce our present standing army by 50 per cent to-morrow. [Applause.]

I do not charge, gentlemen, that only those who are connected in some wise with the Regular Military Establishment are the ones who are opposing this amendment, but I do charge that nobody connected with or in sympathy with the demands of the Regular Army organization is favoring this amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WURZBACH]. I am perfectly safe in stating this proposition.

Now, my friends, if from my viewpoint a large standing army is not necessary, what shall we have in the place of it? Oh, I grant that we must have some manner of standing army, but in order to avoid this standing army increasing all the while, I much prefer to have a large number of schooled and educated Army officers, scattered all over the country, in touch with the common herd, so that in any day of trouble we may quickly organize and mobilize whatever force may be necessary to meet any foe which might come against us.

I sincerely hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas will be adopted for the Quaker reasons, if you please, that I have here presented. [Applause.]

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I asked the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] during his time if he would tell us how he arrived at the figure of 65,000 as the number of Organized Reserve officers to be used in the mobilization of three and a half million troops. He declined to do so.

I asked this question because I have, over the signature of The Adjutant General, Major General Wahl, this statement, dated February 6, 1928:

> In reply to your letter of February 6, 1928, in the latest estimates prepared by the War Department, the number of men to be mobilized is 3,828,878, and the officers are listed as follows:
> Regular Army, 27,103; National Guard, 22,447; Organized Reserves, 141,229; making a total of 190,779.

These figures certainly disclose an error in the reasoning of the gentleman from Mississippi and disclose most convincingly the need for training and equipment of additional reserve officers.

May I add also that during the World War with the mobilization of approximately the same number of enlisted troops—4,057,101—209,684 commissioned officers were used. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WURZBACH].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WURZBACH) there were—ayes 64, noes 54.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. BARBOUR and Mr. WURZBACH.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 83 ayes and 72 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to serve notice that on every one of these amendments we are going to have a vote in the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

> For pay and allowances of members of the Officers' Reserve Corps on active duty for more than 15 days in accordance with law, $673,552.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question. In our Reserve Corps activity we have an Air Corps Reserve. Heretofore it has been the practice, I believe, of the Appropriation Commitee in the War Department bill to carry at least a portion of the appropriation for the Air Corps Reserve in the activities charged up to the Air Corps estimates. Now, it appears that this year out of the appropriation for the reserve come all the expenses relating to the Air Corps Reserve. The assignment of regular officers, the expense and maintenance of planes, and so on, and I would like to ask the gentleman from California if I am correct in that?

Mr. BARBOUR. The training of 110 officers of the Organized Reserves who receive training each year in the Regular Army Air Corps is paid for in this way. The pay of such officers and their traveling expenses are paid out of the Organized Reserves funds. All other expenses of the year's training—planes, gas, oil, and so forth—are paid out of the Regular Army funds.

As to other types of training, the 15-day training and the home training, it is all paid out of the Organized Reserves funds, and the committee believes that it should be so paid because it is strictly reserve training. It is training at the reserve camps, and it is for flying of reserve officers when taking the inactive training at their homes.

Mr. NEWTON. How much would that amount be; what would that figure up in the present measure before us?

Mr. BARBOUR. There is an additional draft on this fund of $538,975 over 1928; but we are giving for all reserve activities an increase of $589,000, which more than offsets this additional draft.

Mr. NEWTON. For the benefit of the members of the Air Corps there is more being appropriated this year than last year?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes; and out of that fund they will be provided with 11 new airplanes to take the place of some that are becoming worn out. They will be planes assigned to the Organized Reserves for inactive and 15-day training.

Mr. NEWTON. In making this change is the committee following precedents with reference to other arms of the service?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes; the National Guard is treated in the same way, and also the reserve officers' training camp. It is largely a matter of bookkeeping anyway.

Mr. NEWTON. There is a great advantage of having all the expenditures for a given activity under one head. In making the change this year, while the gentleman has increased the figures for the Air Corps Reserve, did they reduce the appropriation made for the rest of the reserve?

Mr. BARBOUR. The increased expense over last year is $194,807 for planes, and for antiaircraft target towing $14,364. The total increase is $538,975, so they are getting more money than the amount of the additional expenses charged against them. But, as I said, it seems to me that this is largely a matter of bookkeeping anyway.

Mr. NEWTON. The thing I am interested in is whether in the process of changing the bookkeeping there has been any cutting down of amounts that would go to the Air Corps Reserve?

Mr. BARBOUR. No; there has been no cut in that.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the provision for "Citizens' military training, reserve officers' training camp," beginning on page 58.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. BULWINKLE: On page 61, line 9, after the word "thereat," strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That none of the funds appropriated in this act shall be used for the purpose of employment of hostesses for the citizens' military training camps."

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, the other day I spoke on this, but possibly some of the Members of the House were not present at that time. The bill does not show that hostesses are provided for, but from a statement in the hearings from The Adjutant General's office it shows from the officer representing the War Department that 30,000 men of 17 years of age and upward, staying in camp for two weeks, might become homesick and need a hostess to keep them from homesickness and also to train them in their social activities. I do not think two weeks is a long enough time in which to train these young men in social activities and I do not think that these men are such babies as to become homesick in two weeks. We should stop this. It is a farce to talk about employing hostesses for a camp composed of men who are training to be soldiers. This is all I have to say at the present time on this subject.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] has failed to state that these hostesses are paid. I understand they receive $125 a month. I am also informed that if these social activities are absolutely necessary there are plenty of volunteers who would be glad to render service in such a wholesome atmosphere as a training camp for boys. Two weeks' training, as the gentleman pointed out, is hardly time enough to give these boys that polish so necessary to a proper social atmosphere. If it is contemplated to train the boys in dancing the cotillion or the mazurka or the minuet—or, as some one here suggests, the black bottom—to serve afternoon tea at 5 o'clock and teach these artillerymen how to balance a sandwich, a cup of tea, and a petit four at one and the same time passing them to ladies; perhaps this is necessary, but I do not believe our boys really want this training. I think they would resent it if they knew it had been suggested that it is necessary to have hostesses in two weeks' time when they are away from home in order to nurse them and baby them and prevent them from becoming homesick. If this is to be military training, let us have military training. I think that in two weeks' time—or as long as may be required to prepare a boy to fight—you ought to try to make a hard-boiled egg out of him.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. How many dollars of saving are involved in this to the Treasury?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, it is not a question of saving money. It is a question of not making a thing ridiculous. It is simply seeking to justify the permanent employment of hostesses in the regular camps hereafter.

Mr. BOYLAN. Does the gentleman propose in lieu of this to feed these boys on raw meat for two weeks. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That certainly would be better than tea or petit fours.

The CHAIRMAN The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the provision for "Citizens' military camps," beginning on page 61.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WAINWRIGHT: Page 63, line 8, strike out the figures "$2,801,240" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$3,189,949."

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this amendment deals with the citizens' military training camps. I assume every Member of the House is familiar with these training camps. Here the opportunity is afforded by the Government to lads between 17 and 24 to have the benefit of a military training so as to fit them not only to meet their responsibilities in time of war and also to give them the advantages that come with military training for the fulfillment of their duties as citizens. This amendment increases the appropriation provided for in the bill by $388,709, which will provide for the training of 5,000 more young men than are provided for in the bill, raising the number to be trained from the 35,000 provided by the bill to 40,000. It is interesting to note that since this system of citizens' military training camps was established, in each year a greater number of lads have been trained than the year before. In the last year there were trained very nearly 40,000 young men, to be exact, 39,798. The provision now carried in the bill is for training 35,000, almost 5,000 less than were trained last year. In each year there have been, as I said, a greater number trained, the goal to be reached being about 50,000, which is estimated to be about the number that the War Department can properly train with the facilities they have. If the figure is kept at that carried in the bill, it will be not only a halt in the progressive development of this splendid institution but a step backward.

Mr. BARBOUR. We are providing the same number that we had this year.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. That is quite true. You are providing the money for the same number provided for last year, but, as a matter of fact, there were trained last year almost 5,000 more than were actually provided by the figure carried in the 1928 appropriation bill. As I understand, there was a carry-over of funds which made that possible.

Mrs. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Certainly.

Mrs. ROGERS. I understand it was due to economy. They economized and consequently had more money left over.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. That may be so. But if this figure is not increased, as indicated by my amendment, it will mean that at least 20,000—assuming that the same number will apply next season as applied last season—it will mean that 20,000 or 25,000 of these young men who offer themselves for this training will be denied the privilege. In the year 1926, 49,108 boys applied, and in 1927—last year—57,127 applied, there being thus an increase for 1927 over 1926 of over 8,000; and there is no reason to believe that this year there will not be a similar increase over 1927.

Now, I believe that the general sentiment of the public, of all who know anything about these camps, is that this is the best investment that the Government can make, not only in the line of national security, but the best investment that the Government can make in training each year as many thousand of these young men as possible, who, from the advantages of this military training, will be so much better able to fulfill their duties as citizens.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. In the old days it was very difficult to get men into the National Guard, and the gentleman's idea is that it is now not only easy but the men are anxious to get into these camps, and therefore it is a help to the Government to have the men anxious to get into these camps?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Now, I am sure that every Member of the House who has had some relation to this subject, every Member who has been to one of these training camps, must agree with me that this splendid movement should not be halted. I, along with many others, was surprised that the Budget came through with a recommendation for a decrease for this training from last year to 30,000. It was surprising in view of the statements that have been made by those in supreme authority with regard to these camps. You remember that a son of our President went through three years of these camps, and here is what President Coolidge said on this subject in the year 1924:

Recognizing the great good that comes to the Government and to the people from the citizens' military training camps, I hope that each year an increasing number of young men may take advantage of the opportunity which is afforded them.

And you may also recall that two years earlier President Harding stated that the goal to be reached in these camps should be 100,000. The number that has been determined upon, as I understand, for those who reasonably can be trained by the Army is about 50,000. There is no reason why we should stop this year at 35,000.

Gentlemen, I hope you will agree with me that this amendment should be adopted.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Mr. Chairman and fellow members of the committee, this amendment is identical with one that I have on the desk, with the exception that my amendment would increase the appropriation only $300,000. But I am glad to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WAINWRIGHT] providing for the addition of $388,000.

I would like to have the Clerk at this time read the letter I have received from the citizens' aid committee down in my State.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the communication.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNIVERSITY OF FLORIDA,
Gainesville, February 3, 1928.

Hon. R. A. GREEN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. GREEN: During the citizens' military training camps last year 892 Florida boys were to take advantage of the training offered by the Government. The county and home demonstration agents tell us that as a result of this training, the condition of sanitation and hygiene have been wonderfully improved in the rural districts.

This year it is our desire to give twice as many boys the opportunity to take this training. We have been informed that the Army appropriation bill will carry citizens' military training camp item for only 35,000 boys this year. If this is true, then a vast number of boys will be denied the privilege of building up their minds and bodies by attending citizens' military training camps.

In order for all boys to have a chance to go, it will be absolutely necessary for the citizens' military training camp item to be for at least 40,000. We most respectfully ask that you lend all your influence and support to the bill providing for 40,000 instead of 35,000.

This is our critical year, and your support will mean a great deal to the youth of our State.

With kind regards, we are,

Very truly yours,

B. C. RILEY,
JAMES A. HUDSON,
Civilian Aides for Florida.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Now, gentlewomen and gentlemen of the committee, this, as you will see, provides for the training of the other 5,000 boys who have not been trained heretofore. Of course, provision was made last year for only 35,000, but by close finance and careful organization they were able to train almost 40,000. But this amendment will insure the training of 40,000.

I would like to warn my colleagues as to this, that undoubtedly to-day is no time to retrench in the development and training of American citizenship. You may retrench in the Army, or you may retrench in the Navy; but to-day is no time to retrench in the developing of the physical, mental, and moral manhood of our Nation. There never has been a time when it was needed more than at this time.

To-day the crime wave swells on in our great Nation. Daily, yes, almost hourly, we hear of the occurrence of some horrible crime. Very often these crimes are committed by the youth of our land; yes, young men, many of them still under 20 and at least a majority of instances under the age of 24 years. Twenty-four is the maximum age of entrance into the citizens' military training camps, so thus you see through these annual encampments we are able in a way to educate away from crime, away from lawlessness, away from anarchy, and toward ripe and patriotic American citizenship.

It is impossible for a nation to rise above its citizenship, but it is quite possible and, in fact, a natural consequence for good and proper citizenship to elevate and perpetuate a mighty nation. There are thousands of boys who during school vacation idly loiter on the streets of our towns and cities and through idleness drift into mischief, if, indeed, not into grave crime. If these young men could be encouraged to enter the citizens' military training camps each summer, who will dispute that great good would ensue? Of course, all crime could not be stopped through the training, but is it not reasonable to predict that it would not only be lessened, but that patriotism, physical, mental, and moral citizenship would be fostered? The citizens' military training camp offers great opportunities for the privileged and the unprivileged alike; they are taught sanitation, proper physical exercise, proper habits of living, their own mental possibilities, morality, and decency, as well as politeness, courtesy, and other golden virtues which go to make up splendid American citizenship.

These boys go back to their homes inspired with the information of clean living and with their hearts throbbing with that patriotism which has ever meant so much for American greatness. They tell to others the things learned while in training, and in this manner most effectively and beneficially reflect their improved usefulness in their respective communities. They put into use and practice those things taught them in camp.

Of course, my colleagues, I appreciate the fact that our bill already provides for the training of some 35,000 of these young men, but I insist that it would be money well spent if we would appropriate sufficiently to increase this number by at least 5,000 and let it be understood that at least this number, if, indeed, not more, could be and would be trained each summer. Our vision in citizenship should reach further than to-day; we must in every way offer the best for the citizens of to-morrow, as they will soon be the citizens of to-day and will confront even greater problems of state than do we. I see it my duty to in every way contribute to the Americanism of to-morrow.

The Congress has been liberal in its appropriation for the Army, the Navy, and other necessities of our Government. I fully realize this. It has done this rightfully, is has thus appropriated millions and millions for other purposes, and I do not believe that it is going to deny these civilian aides their request. The civilian aides get no advantage or money from it. On the contrary, they serve without pay. The Major Riley and Mr. Hudson who signed the letter just read by the Clerk will not receive pay for their work and efforts. They are patriotic citizens faithfully and efficiently serving their country as civilian aides for Florida, and hope for no reward other than a safer and better citizenship for to-morrow. They are splendid serving gentlemen.

Mr. Chairman and fellow members of the committee, I shall not now discuss the matter further, but hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York will prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, perhaps no man in this House is in a more embarrassing position than I am at the present time when I speak against an increase in this appropriation. No man in this House has been to the War Department so many times as I have for the purpose of doing something to continue and improve the citizens' military training camps. No man has appeared before the Appropriations Committee so many times and asked for an increase in this appropriation as I have. No Member is a firmer believer in these camps or has visited them more often. In my district I have the largest and one of the most successful camps in this country. It was the first camp which really made a success of the citizens' military training proposition, and it was from this camp that the Plattsburg idea sprung up, which has become the prevailing idea in the citizens' military training camps.

The situation in which I find myself to-day is this: When the Budget recommendations came here provision was only made for the training of 30,000 men. Last year we provided for the training of 35,000 men. At that time I felt that was a reasonable number to ask this country to train every year. I was more interested in establishing a definite policy as to the number to be trained each year than I was in raising the number 1,000 or 2,000 this year and then having a vote on it the next year, when, perhaps, the number would be reduced below that originally provided. I thought, as a cross section of the feeling of this entire country, that perhaps 35,000 was pretty nearly the average and fair number.

When I went before the Subcommittee on Appropriations this year I talked with them along this line, and I agreed with the committee that if they would increase the amount to the same amount that was carried last year, which would provide for the training of 35,000, I would help protect that amount on the floor of the House, notwithstanding the fact that the people in my district would like to have 40,000 or 50,000 men trained each year. And I think what I said to the committee had considerable influence toward increasing the Budget estimate to what is carried in this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Was it not substantially agreed by those who represented the civilian military training camps that 35,000 would meet with their approval?

Mr. SNELL. I was just coming to that. The representative of this association, who is a very fine, high-grade man, and who is giving his time to this work because he believes it is his patriotic duty, and I have nothing whatever to say against him, came to my office and we talked over this whole proposition. I explained my attitude to him and the position I had taken before the committee. When he left my room I understood that was absolutely agreeable to him, and that no move would be made at this time to increase the number. I have acted in good faith all the way through, and the subcommittee, I believe, was influenced in raising this amount by the promise I had made to them, and I thought I represented the people who were directly and most distinctly interested in this training-camp proposition.

I feel it is better to leave the amount as provided by the Subcommittee on Appropriations and establish the policy of training 35,000 men each year, and not one year try to raise the number and the next year try to lower it, and thus always leave the proposition in an indefinite position, where some years you will not get any camp at all. We have already raised the Budget estimate $240,000, and we are appropriating the same amount for this activity that was carried last year and our people should feel satisfied. And I say this as a long-time friend and supporter of citizens' military camp training.

Mrs. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. [Applause.] I wish I had the power to tell you how vitally important I think the training of these young men is. I have in my district at Ayers, Mass., Camp Devens. It is a military post, and it trains the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, the citizens' military training camps, the Organized Reserves, and the National Guard every year. Last summer 10,045 men were trainees at Camp Devens:

Regular Army, 33 officers, 653 enlisted men.
Reserve Officers' Training Corps, 158 infantry.
Citizens' military training camp, 1,058 trainees.
Organized Reserves, 648 officers.
National Guard, 559 officers, 6,936 enlisted men.

I visited that post constantly. I go there when the men first begin their training; I go there during their training; and I go there to give prizes for good marksmanship at the end of their training. I do not go there to teach them to dance, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] facetiously stated was a reason for having hostesses at the camps. I go there to watch them prepare to become good citizens; I watch them learn to protect our flag when they learn to shoot. I want them to shoot well.

I am going to read to you a part of the national defense act of 1916, as amended in 1927, because there seems to be some controversy as to what constitutes the national defense:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Army of the United States shall consist of the Regular Army, the National Guard while in the service of the United States, and the Organized Reserves, including the Officers' Reserve Corps and the Enlisted Reserve Corps.

I am going to read section 47d:

Training camps: The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to maintain, upon military reservations or elsewhere, schools or camps for the military instruction and training, with a view to their appointment as reserve officers or noncommissioned officers, of such warrant officers, enlisted men, and civilians as may be selected upon their own application.

It seems to me it is exceedingly clear that the National Guard and Organized Reserves are component parts of the Army of the United States of America, and the citizens' military training camp is a most valuable source from which all three of the component parts of the Army are recruited. Usually the young men complete their service by going into one of these three component parts. I know that the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] and his committee are in favor of these training camps. You know and I know perfectly well that the future of this country is in the hollow of the hands of those boys. We are going to pass out of the picture before so many years. Those young men are going to take our places, and if war comes those men are going to be called upon to defend us. We want to give them their chance to have at least some knowledge of military practice.

This training prepares a young man to meet his obligations on the field of actual battle as well as to know his duty in citizenship. The opportunity to give every boy who wants to take this training should not be denied. It is his right. No principle of false economy should in any way interfere with the right of the boy to receive this preparedness instruction from the Government.

This Congress of the United States in war time drafts the youth of our country to defend us. It is so simple to vote "aye" to the roll call for conscription. It ought to be easy for us and our bounden duty to vote "aye" to give our young men the chance to be equipped as far as possible mentally and physically for the struggle in our defense.

I remember in England and in France, in 1917, seeing young boys going to the front and their officers told me "they haven't a chance; they are not prepared." Citizens' military training camp training would have meant preliminary preparation for those boys. They would have known what to do and how to do it.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. In reference to that, in the American Expeditionary Force we had men who went up to the front-line trenches against the Germans who never had held a rifle in their hands.

Mrs. ROGERS. I know that is true. A major told me the other day that it broke his heart to send boys against a wall of steel who had not had a chance to learn how to defend themselves. You know how many boys were turned out of the service draft because they were not physically fit. Training camps find out whether our men are physically fit or not.

They correct some of the disabilities they have, and by correcting such disabilities make them physically fit to receive the proper training later, and they are ready for defense duty if necessary.

Some one has spoken of training boys to be hard-boiled. I believe in training them to be men—and they are men—but in training them to be men and hard-boiled they seem to learn a curious gentleness and courtesy so fully, and I know this because I have worked with soldiers ever since 1917, and I am going on working with them always, I trust. A training camp teaches the boys the meaning of service.

It teaches them to get along with boys from the different cities and boys of different descent and from every walk of life. It teaches them cooperation and coordination, and it teaches them respect; and it also teaches them who their Members of Congress are. [Laughter.] I am going to tell you a story about a boy from Maine. I do not see his father here now. In going to the camps at first I found that when I asked the boys who lived outside my own district who represented them in Congress their answer almost invariably was either "I do not know," or "I am not sure."

I found in one barrack a boy who looked very bright and handsome and very attractive, and I asked him if he knew who his Member of Congress was. His reply was, "I do." I then said, "Who is he?" "My father." This was the son of Mr. NELSON of Maine. [Applause.]

The Secretary of War, Mr. Davis, sent his boy to a citizens' military training camp and President Coolidge sent his boy to a citizens' military training camp.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mrs. ROGERS. May I continue for just one moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS. I asked the reason there were more than 35,000 men trained last year. I knew the answer when I asked the question—the corps commanders economized in order to have more to spend in training more men—and, as a matter of fact, I understand the Appropriations Committee has not the power to authorize, anyway, the number of men to be trained; and even if the Committee on Military Affairs authorizes a certain number to be trained, the number of those serving in the national defense can be increased if there is money appropriated and not yet used.

We have unexcelled man power in the United States. Everyone realizes that. We must give them the machinery of war. And I am sure you all agree with me that there is no better citizenship insurance than our military training.

The authorized strength of the Army is fixed in the national defense act at 280,000 enlisted men. The actual strength of the Army is fixed from year to year by the amount of money appropriated annually for the pay of the enlisted men. The national defense act does not fix or limit the number of young men that can attend the military training camps. This number is, or should be, the greatest number that the Government has the money to train.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, this is another amendment which I feel we would not be justified in adopting. This is another matter that the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the War Department went into very carefully. The subcommittee has shown in recent years that it has a very high regard for the citizens' military training camps and that the members of the committee have been real friends of the citizens' military training-camp movement.

Two years ago it was proposed to reduce the appropriation for citizens' military training camps and the members of the committee restored the amount in the bill, brought it in on the floor of the House, and the House indorsed what we then did.

This year it was proposed by the Budget to train only 30,000 trainees. Last year we brought in a bill providing for 35,000 trainees. It is true, as has been said, they found they had more money than they needed, or some holdover money from some prior appropriations, and instead of confining their training to the number which Congress had authorized by the size of the appropriation, they went ahead and spent the money. This the Secretary of War said was not the right thing to do and we felt was not the right thing to do. This year the Budget estimate came down for 30,000 trainees, and the subcommittee put it back practically to 35,000 trainees, or an increase of 5,000 approximately.

Mind you, I do not say definitely we have provided for 35,000 trainees, but we have provided definitely for 34,000; and if they have a little more than half of the carry-over this year that they had last year, they can easily take care of the extra 1,000, making a total of 35,000; and we have every reason to believe they will have that much carry-over, and perhaps more.

We have the right to assume, as the committee intended, that 35,000 trainees are provided for. This is all that has been asked for, except on the part of a few people who are interested in the camps. Telegrams have been sent here urging that we provide for 40,000. The War Department has not asked for 40,000. When the figure of 30,000 was before the committee the Secretary of War was asked how many he could train. He said: "Thirty-five thousand is the figure we would like to train in a well-rounded program."

Thirty-five thousand is all they want, except as I say, a few people who have sent telegrams asking for 40,000. Gentlemen, is that any reason why we should increase this appropriation over $300,000, just because a few people have asked it? Mind you, when you train these young men you have to have Regular Army troops with them for proper training. We already have over 25,000 Regular Army troops giving their time in the summer to the activities of civilian training. It is a fine thing, and I believe in it.

But there is a limit. The additional cost of regular troops has to be taken out of the funds for the Regular Army. This increase that goes in here is not the total cost—it ramifies into other items. Why should we make this increase when the War Department has not asked for it?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I want to emphasize the fact that last year we trained about 40,000 young men.

Mr. BARBOUR. No; it was 38,000 plus—between 38,000 and 39,000. That was done because they found that they had some money left over, and we have the right to assume that there will be some money left over this year.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WAINWRIGHT) there were 27 ayes and 78 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Under the authorizations contained in this act no issue of reserve supplies or equipment shall be made where such issues would impair the reserves held by the War Department for two field armies or 1,000,000 men.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 10286, the War Department appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

STATE, JUSTICE, JUDICIARY, COMMERCE, AND LABOR APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up a conference report and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement is as follows:

MILTON W. SHREVE,
GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM,
ERNEST R. ACKERMAN,
W. B. OLIVER,
ANTHONY J. GRIFFIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, the bill making appropriations for the Departments of State, Justice, and the judiciary, Commerce, and Labor, as it passed the House, carried $89,057,985.14. Including additional Budget estimates considered by the Senate amounting to $640,112.50, the bill as it passed that Chamber amounted to $90,063,507.64, an increase over the total estimates of the Budget of $205,510. The House will recall that when the bill passed here it was $159,900 under the Budget estimates. The bill as finally agreed to between the conferees of the Senate and the House amounts to $89,820,597.64, which is $37,410 under the estimates that were submitted to Congress on this bill. The increases in the bill agreed to in conference over what the bill was when it passed the House are $5,000 more for traveling expenses in the Department of State; $75,000 (Budget estimate) for waterways treaty, United States and Great Britain; $1,500 for rent for the reporter of the Supreme Court; $90,112.50 for salaries and expenses for commissioners of the Court of Claims, Budget estimate; $40,000 for aircraft in commerce, Budget reduction made by the House; $450,000 for air navigational facilities, Budget estimate; $15,000 for promoting European commerce, Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce; $45,000, district office service; $15,000, promoting commerce in the United States; $8,990, Coast and Geodetic Survey; $7,000 for roads in Alaska service in the Bureau of Fisheries; and $10,000 for economics of mineral industries, Bureau of Mines.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 10: On page 41, line 1, after the figures "$3,672,500," insert: "Provided, That there shall be paid hereunder any necessary cost of keeping vessels or other property attached or libeled in admiralty in such amount as the court, on petition setting forth the facts under oath, may allow."

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to allow the Department of Justice to pay expenses incident to keeping property seized under admiralty jurisdiction, until such property is either sold at public auction, returned to the original owners, or otherwise disposed of by way of condemnation, all on action of the court. Without this necessary authority there would be no way to pay the expenses of holding such property and keeping it for the action of the court.

I move to recede and concur in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 15: Page 49, line 8, after the figures insert: "Provided, That hereafter contracts for the subsistence and care of Federal prisoners, within the discretion of the Attorney General, may be made for a period not exceeding three years."

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, this amendment explains itself. The purpose of it is to permit the Attorney General to enter into contracts for a period not exceeding three years for the subsistence and care of Federal prisoners. In view of the uncertainty of the prison population and the difficulty that the department already has in placing excess prison population in penal institutions other than Government owned, it has been found necessary to enter into contracts for their keep for periods longer than the usual contract period of one year.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And what is the time now?

Mr. SHREVE. One year.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. This illustrates the situation we find ourselves in in respect to the Appropriation Committee of the House and the Appropriation Committee of the Senate. You go over to the Senate and you secure legislation, and when I say "You," I do not mean the gentleman personally. The committee obtains this legislation that can not be put on on the floor of the House. It takes from the Committee on the Judiciary a prerogative it has to consider this question. The Judiciary Committee was on call here for two days under Calendar Wednesday business, and if this were advisable, it does seem to me that the responsibility of that committee would have induced them to bring in a small bill extending this from one year to three years. I call attention to this at this time. I do not propose to object to concurring in the amendment. It is a bad practice, and I think the gentleman ought to insist that the Senate conferees realize that.

Mr. SHREVE. I fully concur in the statements made by the gentleman from Texas. We have carried this item along now for three or four years. It becomes necessary in the execution of contracts in the management of our prisons. I would be very glad if the Committee on the Judiciary would take the thing up and give it some authorization by law.

I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 28: Page 63, line 16, insert: "without regard to the provisions of the classification act, for the purpose of assisting in periodical inquiries: Provided, That temporary employees of the Bureau of the Census may be allowed leave of absence with pay at the rate of two and one-half days a month."

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, this amendment is for the purpose of assisting in the conduct of the decennial census. It is necessary, and has been, as long as I can remember, just prior to the taking of a census, to pass this amendment. It is really current law. They do not count the intervening years. The same amendment is passed just previous to the taking of the census in order to provide the Bureau of the Census with facilities for bringing in trained men who may train the younger men who are coming in to do the work, and also for the purpose of employing men for some time less than the classification act provides for.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This provision was in the bill when the committee brought it into the House.

Mr. SHREVE. Yes; and it went out on a point of order. I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 38: Page 98, line 1, after the figures insert: "Provided, That of this amount not to exceed $500 may be expended for the purchase and bestowal of trophies in connection with mine rescue and first-aid contests."

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the Bureau of Mines, this permits the bureau to use the small amount of $500 for the expenditure upon medals and trophies to be given in first-aid mine rescue work. I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 39: Page 99, line 15, after the word "industries," insert: "Provided, That section 192 of the Revised Statutes shall not apply to such purchase of newspapers from this appropriation."

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, this item is for the purpose of supplying necessary information through the public press to the Bureau of Mines in the study of shale-oil situation. It is necessary for them to have all of the periodicals on the subject, and they find they can not get along very well without the information.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. This relates particularly to subscribing in advance?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes. I move to recede and concur.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 40: Page 102, line 11, insert: "Provided, That all moneys received from the sales of fuel shall be credited to this appropriation and be available for the purposes of this paragraph: Provided further, That the requirements of sections 3711 and 3713 of the Revised Statutes relative to the weighing of coal and wood and the separate certificate as to the weight, measurement, or quantity of coal and wood purchased shall not apply to purchases by the Government fuel yards at free-on-board destinations outside of the District of Columbia."

Mr. SHREVE. This is another item that has been carried for several years. This amendment permits the Bureau of Mines under the Government fuel yards to credit to the continuing appropriation of $1,500,000 made a number of years ago the moneys received from the sale of fuel to the different governmental institutions. If this provision was not carried the money received from the sale of fuel would revert to the Treasury and Congress would have to appropriate requisite amounts each year for the conduct of the fuel yard. As it is now, one appropriation was made a number of years ago, and as expenditures are made from it from time to time, the expenditures are offset by a consequent sum received from the Government department or bureau purchasing the coal from the Government fuel yard.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Let me ask the gentleman a question. I refer to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER]. I did not know that we had a revolving fund in this country except that in connection with the Panama Railroad. Do I understand that this is a revolving fund, where Congress can not tell how much is expended on a particular thing?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The amount is not large. It is chiefly for the upkeep and expenses.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. It is really a revolving fund?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I made a statement recently that the only revolving fund I knew of was that in connection with the Panama Railroad.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes. This has been carried for a number of years.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. You say there are several revolving funds?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. There may be.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

RETURN OF A BILL TO THE SENATE

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the highest privilege in the House and offer the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 110

Resolved, That the bill S. 789, in the opinion of this House, contravenes the first clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States and is an infringement on the privileges of this House, and that the bill be respectfully returned to the Senate with a message communicating this resolution.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I am again called upon to perform a rather disagreeable duty; that is, to offer a resolution to send a bill back to the Senate. Yet I am compelled to do so.

The bill just referred to in the resolution provides, among other things, that—any person in the United States who may sell a vessel documented under the laws of the United States and built prior to January 1, 1914, shall be exempt from all income taxes that would be payable upon any of the proceeds of such sale under the revenue act of 1918 or under any subsequent revenue act in force during such 10-year period if the entire proceeds thereof shall be invested in the building of new ships in American shipyards.

It is perfectly obvious to every Member who is present that if a bill may be properly introduced in the Senate to exempt a particular class of sales from the income tax it might be introduced to exempt all sales and all transactions in the application of the income tax. If it could be introduced to exempt all sales of ships and transactions of such persons, a bill could be introduced also that would exempt all individuals from taxes. In short, our whole system of tax laws, as introduced in this House and passed through Congress, would be undermined by bills introduced in the Senate of the same character and nature as this bill to which I have referred in the resolution which I have sent to the desk.

I would not offer this resolution at this time, when so few Members are present, if I were not confident that every Member of the House will concur in the resolution; and unless some other gentleman desires to be heard, I will move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I notice that the resolution refers to a certain clause and section and article of the Constitution, but does not recite the text of the Constitution. I suggest that the gentleman might, at least in his remarks, quote the particular passage by which he claims his resolution is privileged, so that the reader of the RECORD may learn why this bill should be returned to the Senate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And does not the gentleman think that perhaps, in view of the numerous times we have had to perform this act, it would be well enough to quote it for the benefit of the other distinguished body?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes. The gentleman agrees that it ought to be in.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. This resolution, as I understand, is in the regular form of similar resolutions passed by the House on numerous former occasions, as the gentleman from Tennessee has said, as to proposed legislation by the Senate, which they do not have constitutional authority to enact.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is entirely correct. I had assumed that every Member of the House was familiar with the Constitution. The gentleman, I am sure, is fully aware that the provision I referred to is the one that requires that bills raising revenue shall originate in the House.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Of course I knew it, and I assumed that every Member of the House knew it; but along the line suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], I thought it would be wise that the language of the constitutional provision be placed in there for the benefit of another body.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Technically speaking, perhaps, this bill, with some others that have been sent back to the Senate, does not purport to raise revenue, but rather to diminish revenue. But it has the effect of controlling the raising of revenue, and we have had repeated holdings by the Speaker of this House, and other Speakers, as well as the present occupant of the chair, where bills of this nature have been held to be an infringement of the privileges and prerogatives of the House as provided in the Constitution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It does not mean increased revenue, but has to do with getting revenue.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; bills that directly affect the revenue are held to be included within that provision of the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The vote is unanimous.

ORDER OF BUSINESS TO-MORROW

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on to-morrow, after the special orders of the day, the consideration of Calendar Wednesday business be dispensed with for the remainder of the day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BURDICK for three days to attend the funeral services of the late Governor of Rhode Island, Hon. Aram J. Pothier.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 700) entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to execute an agreement with the Middle Rio Grande conservancy district providing for conservation, irrigation, drainage, and flood control for the Pueblo Indian lands in the Rio Grande Valley, N. Mex., and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 278) entitled "An act to amend section 5 of the act entitled 'An act to provide for the construction of certain public buildings, and for other purposes,' approved May 25, 1926," disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. KEYES, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. REED of Missouri to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2343. An act extending the time for completing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River in Ramsey and Hennepin Counties, Minn.

JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they presented to the President of the United States for his approval a joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 112. Joint resolution to amend the act of May 29, 1884, as amended, the act of February 2, 1903, and the act of March 3, 1905, as amended, to include poultry within their provisions.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, February 8, 1928

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God of all power and might, the maker and ruler of men, we commend our Nation to the guidance of Thy wisdom, to the keeping of Thy love. Bless the President of the United States and all others in authority; and so rule the hearts of these Thy servants that they, knowing whose ministers they are, may above all things seek Thy honor and glory. Clothe them with humility, endue them with innocency of life, direct and prosper their deliberations, that all the people of this land may honor them in Thee and for Thee, according to Thy blessed word and ordinance. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, respectfully returned to the Senate the bill (S. 789) to amend the merchant marine act, 1920, approved June 5, 1920, by insuring the exemption from income taxes during the 10-year period there provided of profits on the sale of certain vessels when the proceeds of such sales are invested in new American vessels approved by the Shipping Board, and communicated that, in the opinion of the House of Representatives, the bill contravenes the first clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution and is an infringement of the privileges of the House.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8269) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes; and that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 10, 15, 28, 38, 39, and 40 to the said bill and concurred therein.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

INVESTIGATION OF CONDITIONS IN PENNSYLVANIA COAL FIELDS

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I send to the desk a letter from Judge J. N. Langham, of Indiana, Pa., on the matter mentioned by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] in his speech on conditions in the coal region. I ask unanimous consent that it may be read by the clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read the letter, as follows:

INDIANA, PA., February 4, 1928.

Hon. D. A. REED,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The information contained herein may not be of any value to you whatsoever, but I thought it worth while to write you anyway.

The injunction orders issued by the court of common pleas of Indiana County against certain miners of certain bituminous coal companies are only preliminary injunctions based upon bills in equity supported by injunction affidavits. No hearings have been had, and, of course, the preliminary injunction stands until dissolved or made permanent. You know that under our equity rules a preliminary hearing may be had within five days, or continued until such time as both parties agree. That is the situation in our county, and there has been no request for a hearing on the part of the defendants. In one case I believe a date was fixed, when counsel for the defendants asked for a continuance, and it looks to me very much as if the defendants do not want a hearing.

The interpretation put upon the injunction orders is far from the truth. There is no interference with any form of worship; neither is there any restraint upon contributions of charity to sustain and maintain the strikers, as evidenced by the fact that food and contributions are daily received for that purpose.

I commend you in your avowed intention of voting for any resolution looking toward a full investigation of the bituminous coal situation. I hope the result thereof will be a great and lasting benefit to the laborers concerned.

Very respectfully,

J. N. LANGHAM,
President Judge, Fortieth Judicial District.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I may state that Judge Langham is the common pleas judge who issued the order from which the Senator from California read in his address on this subject.

WORLD WAR VETERANS IN ST. ELIZABETHS ASYLUM

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I suppose that every Senator has had complaints, and perhaps many complaints, about the treatment of veterans in St. Elizabeths Hospital and have heard the allegation that men who were entirely sane have been confined there without court proceedings at the request of the Veterans' Bureau. Typical charges to that effect were contained in a telegram received by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] a few days ago. The Senator from Massachusetts very promptly sent the telegram to the Veterans' Bureau and asked a full report on the conditions of the veteran patients at St. Elizabeths Hospital.

A reply has been received and at the request, and with the suggestion and approval, of the Seantor from Massachusetts I now send to the desk a communication from the United States Veterans' Bureau, inclosing a copy of the telegram to the Senator from Massachusetts and a copy of the report which was sent to him in response to his request. They are too long for me to ask to have them read at this time by the clerk, but I ask that they may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The communications are as follows:

UNITED STATES VETERANS' BUREAU,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR,
Washington, January 30, 1928.

Hon. DAVID A. REED,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR REED: There is attached hereto copy of a telegram received by Senator DAVID I. WALSH from John H. Wallace, Massachusetts department commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and also copy of communication of this date addressed to Senator WALSH explanatory of this telegram.

This is submitted to you for your information, inasmuch as it is possible that the matter may be brought to your attention.

A copy of this letter is inclosed for your use.

Very truly yours,

FRANK T. HINES, Director.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH, Washington, D. C.:

Fearful lest Massachusetts women and other veterans may have been among those railroaded as insane into St. Elizabeths Hospital, Washington, on letters ordering their confinement without court hearing given by General Hines, of Veterans' Bureau, so as to secure their property, the Massachusetts Department of Veterans of Foreign Wars feels congressional investigation necessary of this abuse and arbitrary power of Hines and bureau. For further information and cooperation refer to George F. Curtis, attorney; Marks, managing editor; and Skinner, reporter, of Washington Times; also article in Plain Talk Magazine for February regarding this inhuman outrage and fiendish torture of men and women who fought for country.

JOHN H. WALLACE,
Massachusetts Department Commander.

JANUARY 31, 1928.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: I wish to acknowledge your letter of January 21, 1928, inclosing a Western Union night letter received by you from John H. Wallace, Massachusetts department commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars.

The situation referred to by Mr. Wallace apparently came to his attention through an article appearing in the February issue of a magazine known as Plain Talk. The person submitting this article formerly submitted similar articles to one of the Washington daily papers, but this paper discontinued using such material several months ago.

In order to afford you a general idea of the manner and method of admitting patients to St. Elizabeths Hospital in the past, I will state that numerous ex-service men and women were released from active military or naval service and upon release were transferred from the Army or Naval Hospital to St. Elizabeths Hospital for care and treatment because of their mental condition. Congress has authorized the bureau to utilize the facilities of the Interior Department, which department has jurisdiction over this hospital, and accordingly these ex-service men and women were transferred to the rolls of the United States Veterans' Bureau and the United States Veterans' Bureau assumed the cost of care and treatment of these patients at a specified per diem rate. There was at one time a large number of such patients hospitalized at St. Elizabeths Hospital, but following a policy to hospitalize ex-service men and women nearer their homes, great numbers were transferred to bureau hospitals throughout the country, resulting in a present roll of bureau patients in St. Elizabeths of approximately 375. It is the opinion of the medical personnel of the hospital, who carefully examine and observe these patients over a considerable period, that care and treatment is indicated in each instance. Certainly it is not the intent of this bureau to hospitalize an ex-service man or woman who is not in need of hospitalization, and at present because of the crowded conditions in bureau neuropsychiatric hospitals and as well in State institutions the need for hospitalization must be strongly indicated to warrant the detention of patients. At present, as you probably know, all bureau nueropsychiatric hospitals are filled to capacity and the bureau is utilizing State institutions by contract to care for several thousand ex-service men and women suffering from mental diseases who are in need of hospital care and treatment.

Notwithstanding these conditions, a practice has grown up of contacting patients at St. Elizabeths Hospital for the avowed purpose of instituting habeas corpus proceedings to secure their release. It is understood that such action is taken only in cases where the patient's estate is sufficient to pay fees which run from $300 to $1,000. In many cases where the release of patients from St. Elizabeths has been secured by this means, the hospital authorities as well as the Veterans'

Bureau would have granted the release of the patient if the patient had requested same without the necessity of a court action and the patient would have avoided the payment of large unnecessary fees.

When release from a United States Veterans' Bureau hospital is requested by or in behalf of psychotic beneficiaries not committed by a court every consideration is given to such request by the medical officer in charge, who immediately communicates with the guardian, nearest relative, or responsible representative upon whose application hospitalization of the patient was effected, and explains the patient's condition, advising whether or not release would be to the patient's best interest. A statement is obtained from the guardian, relative, or representative concerned advising that such person will assume full responsibility in the event that the patient is released to their custody. Should the guardian, relative, or representative refuse to assume such charge, or in cases where none of these persons can be located and the patient continues to insist upon release, the regional attorney of the United States Veterans' Bureau for the State from which the beneficiary was hospitalized and the proper civil authorities of the said State are at once notified that the patient demands release and that the bureau is not authorized to retain him. After this notice is given the proper civil authorities, the medical officer in charge returns the patient with such attendance as is necessary to that point to which transportation can be furnished in accordance with bureau regulations, and which has been arranged as the place where the patient will be delivered to the civil authorities.

My records indicate that during a limited period there were brought before the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia 56 patients, many of them beneficiaries of the bureau, on writ of habeas corpus. Of this number who appeared before the court many obtained their release because the jury either found them to be of sound mind or because no adjudication of insanity and commitment proceedings had been had prior to admission to the hospital. Of this number who appeared before the court my records show that 28 are now known to be in institutions for mental diseases, some of them having been returned to St. Elizabeths Hospital, and some later committed by various State authorities to institutions throughout the country because of their mental condition which at the time of their release by the court existed to such extent that they were still in need of hospitalization. Of this number, 13 were returned by the District court to St. Elizabeths because a jury found them to be of unsound mind, and 15 were discharged by either the court or the jury and have been later either readmitted to bureau hospitals or committed by State authorities to State hospitals. Twenty-two of the original 56 who appeared before the court are at present not hospitalized and our social survey reports indicate that in each instance the former patient has failed to make an economic adjustment, but, on the other hand, the current livelihood is being supplied the former patient in the form of bureau compensation. Three of the original 56 have since died and the present whereabouts and condition of 3 others are unknown.

Doubtless those persons who have secured writs of habeas corpus on patients of St. Elizabeths Hospital have materially benefited from such practice, but in no instance does it appear that they have restored an unfortunate ex-service man or woman from the status of a patient in St. Elizabeths Hospital to the status of a useful member of society.

With specific reference to present patients at St. Elizabeths Hospital who are beneficiaries of this bureau, and who have given the State of Massachusetts as their legal residence, I would state that there are six whose names, addresses, status of legal commitment, date of legal commitment, date of admission, whether or not a guardian has been appointed, and the source of admission, if available, are given below:

Name	Residence	Commitment	Date of commitment	Date of admission	Guardian	Source
Canary, James T	Box 304, Nantasket Beach	Yes	July 7, 1925	July 7, 1925	No	Not of record.
Curley, Fred	Boston, Mass.	No		Feb. 11, 1920	No	Hampton, Va.
Missett, John P	Massachusetts	No		Dec. 22, 1919	Yes	United States Marine Hospital, Quantico, Va.
Nagle, Helen	do	Yes	Mar. 12, 1926	Nov. 5, 1925	Yes	State hospital, Manhattan, N. Y.
White, George R	112 Hanover Street, Fall River, Mass.	Yes	Apr. 24, 1924	Apr. 24, 1924	No	Walter Reed Hospital.
Zarecki, Frank	25 Houghton Street, Lynn, Mass.	Yes	Sept. 1, 1921	Sept. 1, 1921	No	Not shown.

The bureau has always endeavored to fulfill its duty to ex-service men and women by offering to them such facilities as may be available to care and treat their diseases and disabilities, and there has never been a desire to hospitalize beneficiaries unless the need for same is plainly indicated.

The present policy of the bureau is to refrain from admitting any beneficiaries to St. Elizabeths Hospital other than beneficiaries who have a legal residence in the District of Columbia.

Your telegram from Mr. Wallace is returned herewith and a copy of this letter is inclosed for your use.

Very truly yours,

FRANK T. HINES, Director.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, in line with the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania I wish to state that this morning complaint was made to me at my office about a man and a woman, both of whom were in Government employ under civil-service regulations, who had been taken from their positions and put in the insane asylum. In the case of the woman, she was made to turn over what money she had to somebody in the city. The complaint is that she has not had a fair hearing in the courts and that she is being detained in the asylum now when there is no necessity for keeping her there or any justification for removing her from the position which she held. I shall have the facts to-morrow, at which time I shall submit a resolution and bring the facts in the case to the attention of the Senate.

COL. CHARLES A. LINDBERGH MEDALS

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the Washington correspondent of a great publication in one of the States to the west made the statement that up to that time, which was 26 days from the time he landed in France, Colonel Lindbergh had accomplished what no person now living or dead had ever previously accomplished; that he had occupied the first page on every cosmopolitan newspaper in Europe and America.

He also stated that he had made himself the hero of every son, the sweetheart of every daughter, the idol of every mother in America. Brilliant as was that achievement, a great many people think that what Colonel Lindbergh has accomplished since then is of greater substantial value than his lone flight across the sea.

Mr. President, some days ago the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] introduced a bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Library, authorizing the striking of a medal by the mint of the United States commemorative of the achievements of Col. Charles A. Lindbergh.

The Committee on the Library yesterday unanimously reported that bill, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. I ask the attention of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I join in the request for unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2996) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare a medal with appropriate emblems and inscriptions commemorative of the achievements of Col. Charles A. Lindbergh, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a medal with appropriate devices, emblems, and inscriptions, commemorative of the achievements of Col. Charles A. Lindbergh shall be prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury at the United States Mint at Philadelphia.

The medals herein authorized shall be manufactured subject to the provisions of section 52 of the coinage act of 1873, from suitable models to be supplied to the mint.

The sum of not to exceed $1,500 is hereby provided, from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to cover the cost of preparation of the model and manufacture of the die.

The medals shall be sold at the mint, Philadelphia, and the proceeds of the sales shall be used to reimburse the appropriations of the mint for the cost of the medals.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PACIFIC SOUTHWEST EXPOSITION

Mr. BORAH. From the Committee on Foreign Relations, I report back favorably, with an amendment, a joint resolution introduced by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], being the resolution (S. J. Res. 62) providing for the cooperation of the United States in the Pacific Southwest Exposition in commemoration of the landing of the Spanish padres in the Pacific Southwest and the opening of the Long Beach, Calif., world port, and I submit a report (No. 256) thereon.

The action of the committee was unanimous, the joint resolution has the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of State, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. I will state that it does not carry any appropriation.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations was, on page 2, line 7, after the word "exhibition," to insert "to sell any goods or property imported for and actually on exhibition," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Pacific Southwest Exposition, held for the purpose of commemorating the landing of the Spanish padres in the Pacific Southwest and the opening of the Long Beach, Calif., world port, is hereby approved.

SEC. 2. All articles that shall be imported from foreign countries for the sole purpose of display at such exhibition upon which there shall be a tariff or customs duty shall be admitted free of the payment of duty, customs fees, or charges, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; but it shall be lawful at any time during the exhibition to sell any goods or property imported for and actually on exhibition, subject to such regulations for the security of the revenue and for the collection of import duties as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That all such articles when sold or withdrawn for consumption or use in the United States shall be subject to the duty, if any, imposed upon such articles by the revenue laws in force at the date of withdrawal; and on such articles which shall have suffered diminution or deterioration from incidental handling and exposure, the duty, if payable, shall be assessed according to the appraised value at the time of sale or withdrawal, and the penalties prescribed by law shall be enforced against any person guilty of any illegal sale, use, or withdrawal.

SEC. 3. The heads of the various executive departments and independent establishments of the Government are authorized to collect and prepare and lend, upon request, to the Pacific Southwest Exposition articles, specimens, and exhibits which, in their judgment, it may be in the interest of the United States to exhibit at such exhibition.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TREATY WITH FRANCE—REMOVAL OF INJUNCTION OF SECRECY

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to another matter, which will take only a moment. The treaty between the United States and France which was signed on the 6th instant was sent to the Senate yesterday. This morning the Committee on Foreign Relations unanimously requested that I ask the consent of the Senate to make the treaty public. Therefore, as in executive session, I now ask that the injunction of secrecy be removed from the treaty and that it be made public.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

[See treaty at close of to-day's proceedings, p. 2688.]

WATER BOUNDARY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I rise to submit a report from the Committee on Appropriations. One day last week, when the independent offices appropriation bill was under consideration, on motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], an amendment was adopted to incorporate a new section in the bill which was totally irrelevant. At the time the chairman of the committee objected, but it was finally arranged that the amendment should be adopted and go to conference. The bill of course went back to the House, and the House refused to agree to the action taken by the Senate, as it had a right to do, and would not allow the bill to go through containing that amendment. In its place, however, the House undertook to pass, and did pass, a bill covering the case entirely, because there is no doubt as to the merit of the appropriation of $65,000 for the purpose intended. So this new bill came to us. It is the bill (H. R. 10636) to make an additional appropriation for the water boundary, United States and Mexico. It provides for exactly the same object which was covered by the amendment to which I have referred. From the Committee on Appropriations I now report the bill back favorably, without amendment, and, with the leave of the Senator from Texas, I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration, so that the unrelated section in the independent offices appropriation bill may be stricken out in conference.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to provide an additional amount for the expenses of meeting the obligations of the United States under the treaties of 1884, 1889, 1905, and 1906, between the United States and Mexico, including personal services, procurement of technical and scientific equipment, camp outfits, and the purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, and $1,200 for rent, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $65,000, to remain available until June 30, 1929.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I wish to thank the Senator from Wyoming for his very valuable cooperation in this important matter. The pending bill is a happy solution.

INVESTIGATION OF PUBLIC-UTILITY CORPORATIONS

Mr. GEORGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the resolution (S. Res. 83) authorizing an investigation of public-utility corporations, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

REGULATION OF TRANSPORTATION RATES

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I desire to offer a concurrent resolution and to ask that it may be printed in full in the RECORD and to lie over under the rule.

The resolution, I will state, has relationship to a very important subject. The Congress has been memorialized by State legislatures, by citizens, and by groups of citizens relative to the policy alleged to have been recently pursued by the Interstate Commerce Commission in regulating the rates of transportation so as to equalize prosperity among producers and communities and to that end, it is claimed, that an abuse of the power of rate regulation has been committed.

The resolution calls upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to send to the Senate on or before April 15, 1928, all decisions rendered by the commission which have relationship to the employment of the rate-regulation power so as to control the relative prosperity of communities and producers, and also asks the commission to furnish to Congress references to such statutes as it is claimed authorize the exercise of the power referred to. I ask that the resolution may be printed in the RECORD, and lie over under the rule.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 10) was ordered to lie over under the rule and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Congress has been memorialized by State legislatures and by citizens to the effect that the Interstate Commerce Commission has attempted so to regulate rates of transportation as to equalize prosperity among producers of commodities and to the end has employed rate regulation to place an embargo upon the products of certain States and in order to favor the products of other States as to certain markets;

Whereas these memorials and petitions indicate the assumption of a power not vested in the commission and a discretion which the Congress can neither exercise nor confer; and

Whereas it is advisable that the Senate should have full and complete information concerning the subject complained of: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Interstate Commerce Commission be requested, and is hereby, instructed to transmit to the Congress on or before the 15th day of April, 1928, the following information, to wit: (a) Copies of all decisions handed down by it in the five years preceding the 1st day of April, 1928, in which its decisions as to the reasonableness of any rate or rates was in any sense influenced by the competitive advantage or disadvantage of the producers in one State, district, or section as compared with the advantage or disadvantage of the producers in another State, district, or section; (b) a full and complete citation of the section or sections of the interstate commerce act as amended, and other acts, under which the commission claims and believes it was granted the power to equalize prosperity among the producers of commodities; and, a statement of the clause or clauses, articles, or amendments of the Constitution under which it claims and believes that decisions of such a character and purport were authorized or were implied.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS—SENATOR NEELY'S VOTE

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Unreliable partisanship," which appears in the New Dominion, of Morgantown, W. Va., in its issue of January 28 last.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNRELIABLE PARTISANSHIP

At least a part of the Republican State press has found Senator NEELY'S vote against the seating of Frank Smith, of Illinois, an encouraging point of attack as the prospect of the campaign looms up.

The suddenness with which some of these papers have become rabid State righters in this matter of national legislative representatives is interesting. The Woodyard weeklies seem especially outraged that Senator NEELY should have seen fit to join with more than 60 other of his colleagues in denying the utilities-financed public service commissioner a seat in the august Senate.

There are, of course, two sincere viewpoints concerning the Senate's right to reject any duly elected Member. That body has the constitutional right to be the sole judge of the qualifications of its Members. One view holds that qualifications means only age and place of residence. The other view holds that the Senate's power extends fully into the manner and means of election.

With the Spencer Times-Record, however, there is only one viewpoint. The fact that able jurists disagree upon the meaning of the word "qualifications" does not disturb that sturdy Republican newspaper. The denying of a seat to Smith is equivalent to "tearing up the Constitution of our fathers like a scrap of paper" and puts the whole structure of our National Government upon the shoulders of "unreliable partisans like Senator NEELY," whose "shameful" vote against Smith is described as "disgraceful" and a "dark blot" upon the Senator's record. There could be no unreliable partisanship about this description, of course. It is Simon-pure truth straight from Moses, the Republican lawgiver. "It is hard to say whether ignorance, partisanship, weakness, or a spirit of demagogy contributed most to our senior Senator's action," declares the Times-Record in a convincing exhibition of real, reliable partisanship, as contrasted with the unreliable partisanship of Senator NEELY.

That Mr. Smith, as an Illinois public-service commissioner, financed to senatorial election success by campaign contributions of the corporations over whose relationships with the people he presided in a judicial capacity, would, if given a Senate seat, have a right to assist in enacting laws governing West Virginians and citizens of every other State in the Union, probably never occurred to the reliable partisanship of the Times-Record. That Mr. Smith's vote, for instance, could possibly be the deciding factor in seating an Interstate Commerce Commissioner who would sanction further strangulation of the West Virginia coal industry by means of adverse freight differentials does not matter. That his vote on a multitude of issues could affect the people of this State vitally is not a consideration. It is of no consequence to or business of the citizens of other States in this Union that they are to be governed legislatively by a man who admits his campaign was financed by corporations against whose strength he was presumed to protect the people of Illinois. No matter what Smith's standard of official conduct in Illinois or how he obtained his seat, he is entitled to legislate for West Virginians if Illinois permits Smith to buy his way into the Senate with money from corporations over whose affairs he presided as judge.

Fortunately not all of our Senators are reliable partisans. Some of them, like Senator NEELY, on the Democratic side, and Senators BORAH, CAPPER, CURTIS (the Republican majority leader), ROBINSON of Indiana, WILLIS—61 out of 84 Senators voting—were "unreliable" enough in their partisanship to feel that their respective constituencies were entitled to some consideration in voting upon the qualifications of a man to legislate for them. Unless the Supreme Court makes "Christians" out of them, they will probably hold on to their unreliablity for some time.

If the Times-Record desires to make the Smith case a senatorial issue in this State, we have no hesitancy in predicting that Senator NEELY will be entirely agreeable.

Recalling the moneyed debacles of Lorimer, Newberry, Smith, VARE, Fall, and other Republican distinctives of the past decade, it is not surprising to find the reliable partisanship of the Times-Record fully hardened to such trifles as attended Smith's election in Illinois. But we recall no public revolt over the repudiation of these Senate seat purchasers in the past. There is not likely to be any in the present instance.

We suggest that Senator NEELY "disgrace" himself further by seeing to it that the voters of West Virgina understand fully that he did vote to keep Smith from the Senate Chamber. After this is done, Senator NEELY will probably suffer the deeper humiliation of being reelected next November.

COTTON PRICES

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I send to the desk a Senate resolution and ask to have it read, and then I should like to ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. Before it is read I wish to state that I had intended to ask that it be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but the matter is of such importance that I am going to ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 142), as follows:

Whereas the 1927 cotton crop is more than 4,000,000 bales less than the production of cotton in 1926; and

Whereas the consumption of American cotton is greater than ever before in the history of the cotton industry; and

Whereas the price of cotton has steadily declined from the time that it was ascertained that the crop would be extremely short; and

Whereas the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the Department of Agriculture stated in a bulletin issued by it that in spite of the short crop cotton prices would decline; and

Whereas from the date of issuance of such statement cotton prices have steadily declined; and

Whereas numerous petitions and memorials have come from different sources alleging manipulation of the cotton market: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry or a duly authorized subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized and directed (1) to make a full and complete investigation of the activities of the cotton exchanges, cotton merchants, bankers, millmen, and the Department of Agriculture, with a view to determining whether there has been any manipulation of the market or any undue influence thereupon in connection with the issuance or publication of cotton reports or the decline in the price of cotton, and (2) to report thereon to the Senate as soon as practicable, with such recommendations for necessary legislation as it deems advisable. For the purposes of this resolution, such committee or subcommittee is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places, to employ such experts and clerical, stenographic, and other assistance, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses, and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, and to take such testimony and make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of such stenographic service to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of such committee or subcommittee, which shall not be in excess of $25,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the Senator understands, I assume, that the resolution must go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate?

Mr. SMITH. I do so understand, but the Senate in its plenary power has from time to time pursued a different course.

Mr. CURTIS. No.

Mr. MOSES. Oh, no, Mr. President; we can not set aside a statute by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I think there are instances where we have passed similar resolutions without reference to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but I am sure that that committee will not unduly hold up the consideration of this resolution, because it affects an industry that has no competitor in the financial and in the commercial affairs of America.

As a matter of course, I am going to accede to the request that the resolution be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but I wish, Mr. President, in conjunction with the submission of this resolution, to read to the Senate the most startling statement that ever emanated from a bureau of this Government on an economic question. I wish to read from a bulletin issued on September 15, beginning on page 4, and running down to the middle of page 5. Here is what this bulletin says:

Crop conditions in the United States on September 1 indicate a production of only 12,692,000 bales—

Which, by way of parenthesis, is a little more than has actually been produced, and is at least 4,100,000 bales less than the crop of 1926.

In 1926 the consumption of American cotton, both at home and abroad, exceeded by 2,000,000 bales any previous year's consumption. We produced then about 18,000,000 bales, and the world's consumption of American cotton, both domestic and foreign, was something like sixteen and a half million bales. In view of those facts, let me read on:

Crop conditions in the United States on September 1 indicate a production of only 12,692,000 bales, a decline of 800,000 bales during August. Declines occurred in all States except New Mexico, Arizona, and California, the principal decline being registered in Oklahoma. In all important cotton States the weevil is the dominating factor in the situation. Propagation of this pest has been accelerated by wet weather over much of the belt. Infestation increased materially in all infested areas, and the area where weevils were prevalent extended northward materially during the month of August. The extent of infestation has quite generally checked fruiting, and the probability of any important top crop is small over large areas.

Now, here comes a startling prediction from the Bureau of Economics of the Department of Agriculture:

As the size of the crop is becoming more definitely established, the market should become more stable and the tone in the yarn and finished goods market should be more settled. Due to the fact that the prospects of a top crop are very small, cotton will be ginned unusually early this year. As was indicated in last month's report, should the present estimate of production be realized, and past relationships between supply and price prevail, it is likely that prices will decline in the next few months.

They take two or three paragraphs to show that the terrible condition under which the cotton then in the stage of production found itself is hardly short of a disaster; and after predicting that we would have possibly from four to five million bales less than last year, with the world's consumption of cotton 2,000,000 bales greater than ever before in the history of the country, they make the astounding statement to the world at large that in view of the fact that we possibly might not make enough to supply the demand of the country the price would decline!

What happened? The very day the public was made aware of that fact cotton declined the limit allowed on the exchanges, 200 points, or $10 a bale, and has steadily declined from that day until this.

In connection with that let me call attention to another astounding thing on the same page. They say that the world carry-over of American cotton from the crop of 1926 was 7,800,000 bales. Immediately Mr. Hester, of New Orleans, who is the recognized authority on cotton statistics, challenged the statement, and demanded to know the sources from which this official pronouncement was made; and the controversy became such that I left my home and came on to Washington to ascertain the sources from which they got the astounding statement that 7,800,000 bales of the old crop of American cotton were still held in stock in foreign countries and in America.

I asked the Bureau of Economics to furnish me the sources from which they ascertained this marvelous carry-over, because you can see at a glance that if the cotton crop was to be extremely short, in order to supply the world's needs there must be a source of American cotton somewhere else besides that that was being produced in the field. Consequently the trade were led to believe that there were 7,800,000 bales of old cotton to add to whatever crop would ultimately be made, and I demanded to know the sources; and I want to put in the RECORD those sources from which they got their estimate of the 7,800,000 bales. Here is another startling revelation.

I hold in my hand a copy of the facts as given me by the Bureau of Economics, alleging the sources from which they obtained the information as to the number of bales of old cotton held at home and abroad. They give the New Orleans Cotton Exchange's estimate, Mr. Hester; the Commercial and Financial Chronicle, which paper is alleged to be—I do not know—controlled by European interests; the United States Bureau of the Census. Now, I want the Senators to pay attention to this fact. This is the United States Bureau of the Census, the bureau that we charge with the specific duty of gathering statistics as accurately as may be, and giving them to the public. They give the Bureau of the Census, Commerce and Finance, Mr. Price's paper; and the International Cotton Federation.

Now, listen:

The total estimate of Mr. Hester, who gives stocks in United States, mill stocks in southern mills, in northern mills, and total mills in the United States, I ask to have printed, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH. The New Orleans Cotton Exchange, under Mr. Hester, estimated that the carry-over was 6,952,000 bales; the Commercial and Financial Chronicle, 7,818,000. That is the total of both domestic and foreign stocks. The Bureau of the Census did not attempt to give the foreign holdings, but gave the domestic holdings as 3,663,000. Commerce and Finance, Mr. Price's paper, estimated it at 7,521,000.

The Bureau of Economics reports authoritatively as a Government organ that there were 7,800,000 bales, whereas if you had taken the domestic holdings as estimated by the Bureau of the Census and added it to the estimate of the Chronicle of foreign holdings you would have had 300,000 bales less than they reported was on hand. In other words, the Bureau of Economics totally ignored the statistics as promulgated for domestic consumption by the Bureau of the Census, and evidently took the Commercial Chronicle figures in toto. They lack only 18,000 bales of quoting exactly what the Commercial and Financial Chronicle had estimated.

If one bureau is to ignore another bureau, if one bureau is to duplicate the work of another, what is the use for us to appropriate money for the use of the Bureau of the Census, if the figures compiled by them are to be ignored in a market letter by the Bureau of Economics?

When this resolution comes up for consideration I shall go into the details of the monstrous condition that now confronts us. With the consumption of American cotton exceeding anything in the history of cotton production in America, with the shelves of the merchants bare, with the foreign trade taking last year 11,000,000 bales, more than a million more than ever was exported before in the history of cotton, now, with more than 4,000,000 bales less in this year's crop than in last year's crop, since the issuance of this marvelous prognostication by the Bureau of Economics cotton has declined from the price that was formerly being obtained until now it is $40 a bale lower—a loss in my State alone of more than $40,000,000.

It might be interesting to note, right in this connection, that on account of the crop being fairly good in some sections of my State, where we use such an enormous amount of fertilizer, the fertilizer companies have advanced the price some $5 to $7 a ton, alleging that they must recoup their losses of last year, when they sold it $5 to $7 a ton cheaper than they are now selling it; and the price of cotton has gone down to a point where it is anywhere from 3 to 4 cents a pound below the cost of production. The farmers have no way to recoup the losses of last year.

In other words, those that helped us to fertilize the land to produce the cotton are claiming the right to raise the price of fertilizer now to a point where they can recoup the loss of last year, while the medium through which the farmer is to pay for that fertilizer is going down even a greater per cent than they are raising the price of their fertilizer. In other words, the cotton producer is now in a situation where it is "Heads I win, tails you lose."

I think the circumstantial evidence surrounding the marketing of this crop is such as to warrant this body, which has power under the interstate-commerce clause to control commerce in legitimate channels, in investigating rigidly the bankers, the exchanges, the manufacturers, every party that may have knowledge of this matter sufficient to give us light as to whether the market has been manipulated.

I tell you, Mr. President, it is a monstrous proposition when we are paying from $2 to $2.50 for a 5-ounce shirt, and the cotton out of which it is made is bringing 15 cents a pound.

There is no doubt that we have great prosperity, in spots. That prosperity is brought about by virtue of the fact that the great, colossal combinations of this country, which seem to be the logic of modern conditions, are dictating to the vast majority of American people what they shall get or shall not get. I have about come to the conclusion that it is almost useless for us to pass any laws here. These combinations either find ways and means of evading them or they openly defy them, and nothing is done about it.

I sincerely hope that the Senate, when the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate shall have reported this measure favorably, which I am sure they will do, we shall take the matter up and begin at once the investigation of what is nothing short of a monstrous scandal.

COMPILATION OF INDIAN LAWS AND TREATIES

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to what I am about to say, because it is a matter in which he is interested.

I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which Senate Resolution 115, relating to the printing of laws, agreements, and so forth, relating to Indian affairs, was agreed to day before yesterday be reconsidered, in order that I may move to amend it so as to include the laws passed by the Sixty-ninth Congress, which were not included in the resolution as submitted to the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to express the hope that the request made by the Senator from Connecticut will not be objected to. The work contemplated in the resolution will not be complete unless the laws passed by the Sixty-ninth Congress are included, and I think most of the Senators who are interested in the matter were under the impression that the resolution did contain a provision that the laws passed during that Congress should be included.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to object to including the laws passed during the Sixty-ninth Congress, but I want to express the hope again that this will be the last time such a request is made and the last time the Government of the United States will be called upon to print a compilation of the Indian laws. This printing began about 25 years ago, I think, and at the time the laws were first printed it was stated that that was the only request of the kind which would be made; but every five years there is another request. I am not going to object to this, as I have said, but I hope it will be the last request of its kind, and the man in charge of the compilation assures me that as far as he is concerned it will be the last.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut that the vote be reconsidered? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered, and the resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the resolution be amended by adding, in line 5, after the comma, the words "together with such additional laws, agreements, Executive orders, proclamations, etc., relating to Indian affairs as were enacted or promulgated during the Sixty-ninth Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7009) to authorize appropriations for construction at military posts, and for other purposes; requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. MORIN, Mr. JAMES, and Mr. MCSWAIN were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

PUEBLO INDIAN LANDS, NEW MEXICO

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate yesterday passed Senate bill 700, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to execute an agreement with the Middle Rio Grande conservancy district providing for conservation, irrigation, drainage, and flood control for the Pueblo Indian lands in the Rio Grande Valley, N. Mex., and for other purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is the bill in the possession of the Senate?

Mr. FRAZIER. No; I understand the bill has been sent to the House. I move that a request be made of the House to return the bill to the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS—ALASKAN RAILROAD

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, last Monday I entered a motion for a reconsideration of the vote by which the appropriation bill for the Interior Department was passed, and I now ask that the motion be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion to reconsider, made by the Senator from Nebraska, of the votes by which House bill 9136, making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, was ordered to a third reading and passed.

Mr. SMOOT. I suppose the Senator desires to address himself to the motion?

Mr. HOWELL. I desire to address myself to the motion inasmuch as I understand it will be opposed.

My purpose in making the motion is to enable the Senate to consider that portion of this appropriation bill found on page 108, wherein is provided an appropriation for the Alaskan Railroad. Although the appropriation herein provided for amounts to about $2,550,000, it was passed without any consideration or discussion whatever, and in a similar way similar appropriations have been made by the Senate for several years, and I feel the time has arrived when the Senate ought to consider the meaning thereof and the fact that we are temporizing at a cost to the Government of large sums of money. In fact, since the construction of this railroad was begun the accrued interest, plus the deficits in operation, total about $31,000,000, and we are adding to the deficits every year without any hope of relief so far as the railroad finally reaching a position of independence is concerned. Not only is there no hope of relief, so far as a return upon the cost of the railroad is concerned—some $57,300,000—but there also seems no hope of this railroad paying its expenses of operation and maintenance.

In my opinion, the time has arrived when we ought no longer avoid but consider this problem. I have here on the wall a map of Alaska. Here is the railroad, extending from the Gulf of Alaska 500 miles north, and within 150 miles on either side of this road there is a territory nearly two-thirds the size of Texas, wherein there are not 8,000 people, and 3,000 who are there are there merely because of the railroad. Yet this bill not only calls for the operation of this railroad for the benefit of less than 5,000 people but it also provides for the operation of 39 miles of narrow-gauge road at the north end of this railroad purchased by the Government from an exploration company and which the United States Smelting, Refining & Mining Co., of Boston, now insists we shall continue to operate at a loss for its benefit.

I have made a motion for the reconsideration of the vote by which this bill was passed because I want to offer an amendment providing that no funds shall be utilized during the coming year, as proposed in this bill, for the operation of that 39 miles of railroad for the United States Smelting, Refining & Mining Co.

Mr. President, if the company wants the road operated, let them operate it at their own expense. It had a net profit from its various activities last year of $4,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. NORRIS. Is there any opposition to the reconsideration?

Mr. HOWELL. I understand that there is.

Mr. NORRIS. So long as I have been in the Senate it has been the custom, when a request of this kind is made, to reconsider by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. This is an appropriation bill which has already been passed.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. When the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] gets through, I want to have a chance to state the reason why I think it is perfectly useless to reconsider the matter.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not expressing any opinion as to the merits of the amendment, but my colleague wants to offer an amendment. The bill was passed probably in his absence. Every day or two some Senator wants to offer an amendment, asks for a reconsideration, and the vote is reconsidered by unanimous consent. I hope no one will object to the reconsideration in this case. Then let the amendment be presented and debated, and the Senate can decide as to whether it shall be adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. If it is distinctly understood that the bill will not be open to further amendment, but that amendment is simply to be confined to this one provision, I am perfectly willing to have a vote taken upon the amendment; but I do not want to have the appropriation bill thrown wide open in order to do that.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think anyone would contend that that should be done.

Mr. HOWELL. Let me say just a word. I might offer another amendment to this particular item in another form.

Mr. NORRIS. That would be all right.

Mr. SMOOT. I care nothing about that, but I want it distinctly understood that if the vote by which the appropriation bill was passed is reconsidered, the bill will not be open for any further amendment than that which applies to the Alaskan Railroad.

Mr. NORRIS. All right.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection at all to have a vote upon any amendment the Senator may offer with respect to the railroad.

Mr. NORRIS. All right. Let the Chair state the request and see if there will be any objection.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I do not care how this matter is reached. Of course, I take the view of the situation contrary to that which is taken by the junior Senator from Nebraska. It seems to me we might as well discuss it on the motion to reconsider as on the motion to amend. However, I do not care how it is done.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought so, too, but I am perfectly willing that we shall reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, for the purpose only of considering amendments to be offered by the Senator from Nebraska relating to the Alaskan Railroad.

Mr. NORRIS. Do not confine it to the Senator from Nebraska, but to that railroad.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DALE in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska make the request?

Mr. HOWELL. I make the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator please state it?

Mr. HOWELL. I make the request that we reconsider the votes by which the Interior Department appropriation bill was ordered to a third reading and passed so far as the item respecting the Alaska Railway is concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think anyone will object, but technically I do not think my colleague has stated it quite correctly. He ought to ask to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed, and then include in it a limitation, that if the request is granted no amendment shall be in order to the bill on its further consideration except amendments pertaining to the Alaska Railway.

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. HOWELL. I make the request in that form.

Mr. WILLIS. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment for reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nebraska.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 108, line 14, following the word "road," insert the words "excluding the Chatanika narrow-gauge branch extending northeast from Fairbanks."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nebraska. All those in favor of the amendment——

Mr. WILLIS. Oh, no, Mr. President. I want to be heard on that question. I thought the Senator from Nebraska wanted to speak first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the Congress of the United States some time prior to 1915 authorized the construction of what is now known as the Alaskan Railway. An examination of the history of the enterprise and of the circumstances attending suggests that the railroad never would have been built had it not been for the fact that some time prior to this date a railroad company had built a line from Seward, Alaska, as I indicate upon the map here on the wall, north into the Kenai Peninsula some 56 miles. That railroad company failed. Another was organized, and it also made a failure of the enterprise.

Some time prior to that, as I understand it, the Guggenheim interests built 39 miles of narrow-gauge railroad extending out northeast from Fairbanks and south to the Tanana River. When it was determined to build this Government line that narrow-gauge road was being operated at a loss of about $250 a day. There is no interest on this continent that has the hardihood to purchase hopelessly bankrupt and failing concerns except the Government of the United States, as recently illustrated in the case of the Cape Cod Canal.

As a consequence, the owners of the 56 miles of railroad extending north from Seward and the narrow gauge out of Fairbanks got behind the proposal to build a railroad north from the Alaskan Gulf through Alaska, and were undoubtedly the ones responsible, ultimately, for this great public-ownership enterprise. And the reward was the sale of their properties to the United States Government for $1,100,000. As I stated, the narrow gauge extending out from Fairbanks was losing $250 a day, and as for the 56 miles north from Seward, there had not been a train over the road for five years.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Am I to understand the appropriation carried in the bill provides for operating that railroad which for five years has ceased operation?

Mr. HOWELL. That road has been rehabilitated and is now an integral part of the broad-gauge system, from Seward to Fairbanks, but this appropriation also provides for the operation of the narrow gauge, which is not an integral part of the system at all, and which will be operated almost solely for the benefit of the United States Smelting, Refining & Mining Co.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. When the 39 miles of railroad was bought, it was bought for the very reason that it was about the only industry there which gave employment to the people who were in Alaska. As I understand it now, the Government is not losing money on that branch of the road.

Mr. HOWELL. We certainly are.

Mr. SMOOT. I say as reported to me. Where we are losing money is in the long stretch of country from Seward north. Clear up into that territory, the whole length of that territory, there are not more than 8,000 people. The operation of the road and keeping it going could not be otherwise than at a net expense. I do not like to hark back, but when the whole proposition was first made in this body I told the Senate then my opinion of the building of the road, that it would not only be a failure as a railroad but it would never in the world bring 100,000 to 200,000 people into Alaska. My predictions at the time have proven true. That railroad was going to furnish to all the world sufficient coal to run all the industries. The whole coal section in Alaska has been tied up because of the restrictions placed by our Government upon the taking up of coal locations, and so forth.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It is largely true, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. It was true at the time, but the results anticipated did not take place.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, is it the fault of the railroad that there has not been a demand somewhere else in the world? The coal is there and the mines are being operated in the greatest coal field in the world. Does the Senator charge that condition to the railroad?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not say that I charge it. I do know that it has been charged to the railroad. It is a condition that exists. The Government has the money in the railroad. The question is how best to get it out. If we are going to operate the railroad at all, we can not operate it under conditions in Alaska to-day without a loss. The great loss consists in the main line running as I have indicated on the map. I would not want to cut out the little part which, I understand, is paying its own way and giving employment to the people there.

Mr. HOWELL. I make the statement positively that it is not making money.

Mr. SMOOT. I am only stating what I have been told. I do not know whether it is or not. Not only that, but I want to say that if we stopped that section of the railroad I do not know what would become of the few people who have settled around there and are doing work and who are producing and making money.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. In just a moment I will yield. Something has been said about coal in Alaska and why it has not been developed as expected. The facts are that although there are very large coal deposits in Alaska it is either but a high-grade lignite or a bituminous coal found in broken formation and so intermixed with slate that it has to be washed. As a consequence, by the time they transport this coal to Portland or Seattle its cost, laid down, exceeds that of Pocahontas coal shipped to the west coast via the Panama Canal.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to suggest this to the Senator: I suppose he knows from what I have said to him that I appreciate the fact that there is an evil there which ought to be corrected. The proper thing to do, in my opinion—and I suggest it in all seriousness and earnestness to the Senator—is to introduce a bill here, a separate and distinct measure covering the whole subject matter. I assure the Senator that I shall take the deepest possible interest in it. But we can not stop the appropriation now in this way. We can not paralyze the industry of the people of Alaska without some kind of a notice to them. I think myself that the predictions made as to the cost of the road were very correct. I think the first appropriation was $30,000,000 and that was increased to $52,000,000 immediately—that is, as soon as the road was completed. It has been a very expensive undertaking on the part of the Government.

I believe that legislation ought to be enacted, but it ought to be in a separate bill. We ought to have time to consider it. When we take the step, let us take a step that will give notice to the people of Alaska that we have such legislation under way and let them be heard at the time the bill is under consideration. In all fairness I say to the Senator that is the proper way to do it. I have a great deal of sympathy with what he has said. I know the situation. Every time the appropriation bill comes up with $1,300,000 for the Alaskan Railroad this question arises. It used to be more, but we have cut off $100,000 this year. We have gone that far at least, as the amount has been higher than this in the past.

Mr. HOWELL. The reason why they have cut off $100,000 may be due to a neglect of maintenance, and they make no charge for depreciation.

Mr. SMOOT. That has been done right along.

Mr. HOWELL. Of course it has; and when the Senator says we have saved $100,000 this year, there is no positive evidence to that effect, and I believe I can demonstrate the fact. What they are asking for is $400,000 for new capital expenditure in lieu of funds to take care of deferred maintenance.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the same as it was last year, and it has never been less.

Mr. HOWELL. But what it means is that that $400,000 is used to make up a part of the depreciation which, of course, the road out of its earnings can not take care of.

Now, so far as the premises laid down by the Senator are concerned——

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator said we are appropriating $1,300,000. Is that over and above the revenue the Government gets?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes; it is.

Mr. SMITH. That means that it lacks that much of paying expenses?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no. This is the total amount, and whatever they collect, though it is not very much, goes into the Treasury.

Mr. HOWELL. They use the total amount.

Mr. SMITH. That is the point I want to get at, that the revenues derived are used by the company to defray expenses, and after all that is absorbed the $1,300,000, in addition, is necessary.

Mr. HOWELL. Absolutely.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield there? He has been very kind.

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. Since reference has been made to the matter of the deficit, it may be worth while to have the facts. In 1924 the deficit was $1,813,000; in 1925 it was $1,673,000. Note the downward trend. In 1926 the deficit was $1,169,000; in 1927 it was $900,000. In other words, that railroad is being so managed that every year the deficit is decreasing. Senators ought to bear that in mind. The deficit is not increasing, but it is decreasing; the railroad is being maintained and is in splendid condition, considering the circumstances.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the trouble with the conclusions of the distinguished Senator from Ohio is that he has not analyzed the expenditures in connection with this railroad. They come here and ask us for $1,300,000, which is the same amount or more than they asked last year; but they say that $400,000 of this is for capital expenditures. Then, when you ask, "What provision have you made for depreciation?" they tell you, "None." At the least the depreciation would be 2 per cent; and 2 per cent upon $60,000,000—which is about the sum the railroad has cost—is $1,200,000. What they are suggesting in their report is, "We have not made enough to operate this railroad by $900,000"—we will say—"but we do want $400,000 more to make up depreciation, and we will call it new capital."

Mr. SMITH. Does the Senator from Nebraska have the figures as to what we allow the continental railroads for depreciation? What is the annual per cent that those railroads claim for depreciation?

Mr. HOWELL. It is from 3½ to 4½ per cent upon rolling stock and from 1 to 2 per cent upon structures.

Mr. SMITH. I think on the average, as I recall—I have not informed myself as to the figures recently—around 3 per cent plus is the amount it is claimed must be charged off to depreciation annually for the railroads of our country.

Mr. KING. That is correct.

Mr. HOWELL. That is what the railroads claim.

The statement that I have made is in accordance with the attitude generally of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Of course, the railroads want to make the allowance for depreciation as much as possible. In my opinion, in connection with the Alaska road the depreciation is at least 3 per cent, because the railroad is within a region subject to long winters and floods in the spring. As a consequence, the depreciation is probably not less than $1,800,000 a year. All they provided for in this bill under the head of capital charges is $400,000. Some day they will have to ask for very large additional sums.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question right there?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. In a word, if the Senator can answer, what is now the general physical condition of the road?

Mr. HOWELL. I was over the road in 1923. The condition then was not good. I understand that it is better at the present time.

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. HOWELL. But necessarily the condition is not what would be called "good" as compared to one of our continental railroads.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Precisely. Does the Senator propose to abandon the system or to maintain it?

Mr. HOWELL. I do not propose to abandon it. What I propose is a cutting off of certain unnecessary sections of the railroad and thereby reducing our loss to a minimum.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I have been given to understand that this feeder or lateral road yielded a very considerable revenue, and that the total deficit was not due to that lateral road, but rather to the more extensive stretch of railroad where the traffic is very light and the passenger business almost negligible.

Mr. SMOOT. Every dollar which is derived from the 29 miles of lateral road is expended on the road.

Mr. HOWELL. Pardon me; the lateral is 39 miles long.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps it is 39 miles; but every dollar which it earns is expended for the railroad itself; and if that income were not available the railroad would be here asking for an additional amount of money; in other words, the overhead, the expense of operating trains and engines, and all other expenses are not materially increased on account of the 39 miles of road.

Mr. HOWELL. The last report of the manager of the road shows that the income is less than the expense of operation.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. On this lateral road?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes; on this narrow gauge road.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not what I was talking about. The railroad itself takes every single, solitary cent of income and uses it for the operation of the road. The amount which we have appropriated is an additional loss. If we shall abandon the 39 miles of railroad and not operate it at all, the overhead expenses will be just exactly the same, and what shall we have saved? Perhaps the salary of an engineer and a few men; that is about all we should save. We should, however, lose the total revenue from that branch of the road, and that is not where the great loss comes.

Mr. HOWELL. But the operation of that road adds to the deficit every year.

Mr. SMOOT. It will, I admit.

Mr. HOWELL. It does now.

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. HOWELL. I beg pardon. I will read from the report.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I beg pardon of the Senator for interrupting, but I am interested in the subject matter which we are discussing. California is very directly interested in that territory and in the subject matter.

Mr. SMOOT. Averaging the proportionate expenses, the wear and tear, the overhead, the interest upon the money, and everything else, and prorating those items to the 39 miles of railroad, a loss will be shown; but the expenses of the Alaska Railroad run on any way whether it operates that branch or whether it does not, and there is derived considerable revenue from the 39 miles of road which goes toward operation expenses. We ought to look at the thing in a sensible, business-like way. If we are going to stop all appropriations for this purpose we will put out of operation the entire railroad system of Alaska. Do not let us get away from that fact.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. We had better give Alaska back to Russia if that is the plan of some gentlemen. I want to keep it.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. I will yield in a moment. I am amazed that the Senator from Utah will continue to make the statement that the operation of this branch or lateral road does not add to the deficit of the Alaska Railroad.

Mr. SMOOT. I said that prorating the expenses of the road, including wear and tear, upkeep, expenses of administration, and all other items to the 39-mile branch, it about breaks even, as I am told; but I say that if we abandon the road we will have all the overhead expenses, we will have the same investment, we will have the same number of cars, we will have the same number of clerks to do the work that we have now, and we will not have the revenue which is now derived.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I wish to refute the statement made by the Senator from Utah. In that whole region there are only about 4,000 people living permanently.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, what does the Senator include in the expression "that whole region"?

Mr. HOWELL. I am talking about the Fairbanks region.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. HOWELL. I am not mistaken.

Mr. WILLIS. Well, when was the Senator in that region?

Mr. HOWELL. The population of the Fairbanks district——

Mr. WILLIS. I am asking the Senator how recently he was at Fairbanks?

Mr. HOWELL. I was there in 1923.

Mr. WILLIS. I was there within five months. The Senator is mistaken; that is all there is about it. There are more people working at Chatanika than are living at Fairbanks. The Senator does not know the development of that little village of Chatanika. He thinks that is an obscure point, but there are hundreds of people working at that place. I was there within five months, and I saw them. The Senator was there in 1923, when it was undeveloped.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the entire population of Alaska?

Mr. WILLIS. I should say there are 70,000 in the whole Territory.

Mr. OVERMAN. My understanding is that there are only about 20,000 white people there.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator is mistaken when he says there are only 20,000 white people there.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. There are no electoral votes in that Territory, as Senators know.

Mr. JONES. Alaska sends delegates to the conventions, however.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes; they send delegates to the conventions, and also a Delegate to Congress.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I make the statement without any question in my own mind as to its correctness, that there are not 8,000 people living permanently within 150 miles on either side of this 500 miles of railroad in Alaska.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean outside of the 39-mile branch?

Mr. HOWELL. I am talking about the area around Fairbanks; I am taking in this whole region [indicating on map], which is nearly two-thirds the size of Texas, and in this region there are not 8,000 people.

There [indicating on map] is the town of Seward, which is the point where the railroad starts, and there [indicating on map] is the town of Anchorage, the largest town in Alaska. I say there are not 4,000 people around Fairbanks at the present time. With all due respect to the senior Senator from Ohio, I feel he is depending upon what his eye saw and not upon the figures which the enumerators find in determining populations.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to state again that it must be evident to everyone that if we were operating a 39-mile street-car line for a population of 4,000 people we would not expect it to pay.

Mr. SMOOT. That is a different question.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, with great respect, assuming that to be so, we own Alaska; we are endeavoring to develop Alaska, its timber, its fishing, its mining, its farming—and it is possible to raise the finest strawberries at Fairbanks to be found anywhere outside of Virginia——

Mr. SMOOT. And Utah.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Does the Senator propose to scuttle the ship and to abandon Alaska or to maintain this railroad? That, it seems to me, is a reasonable question, and I put it very earnestly.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Ohio will tell you, as he told me, that the Fairbanks Exploration Co. has created a great deal of activity about Fairbanks and at Chatanika, to which place he has referred. If there is any increase in population it is due to that activity.

Mr. KING. To the activity of a private corporation.

Mr. HOWELL. What is the Fairbanks Exploration Co.? It is a subsidiary of the United States Smelting, Refining & Mining Co., of Boston. That company has net assests of $76,000,000, according to its last report. They have outstanding in the neighborhood of $30,000,000 or $35,000,000 of stock, and last year they earned on their preferred stock about 8.3 per cent and upon their common stock 6.6 per cent. This is the company interested in operating this Chatanika branch. They are perfectly able to operate it themselves if they need it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator, will we sell it?

Mr. HOWELL. Just a moment. My proposition is this: If that short-line, narrow-gauge railroad, which is no integral part of the Alaskan Railway, is necessary to the success of their enterprise, why not say to this powerful, profitable company, "Take it, operate it, and pay the expenses. We are through. We will not impose an expense for the operation of this railroad upon the people of the United States that you may make more money"? Who will say that that is not business and justice?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, how did we acquire this short-line road? We appropriated $30,000,000, or thereabouts, to build this road. Did we build that short-line road, did we buy it, or how did we acquire it?

Mr. HOWELL. I thank the Senator from North Carolina for asking me that question. That road, I understand, was owned by Guggenheim interests, another exploration company. It got into the habit of losing $250 a day, and they said: "Well, you are building a railroad up into this country, why not take over our narrow-gauge line?" And Congress, or somebody connected with the administration, kindly and generously bought that railroad and took a lemon off their hands.

Mr. KING. How much did we pay them?

Mr. HOWELL. I do not know how much we paid for that particular railroad; but for that and the 56 miles of unoperated railroad in the Kenai Peninsula, over which a train had not passed for five years, we paid $1,100,000.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. When was that Mr. President; during what administration?

Mr. HOWELL. I do not remember.

Mr. SMOOT. It was during the Democratic administration; but let us not bring politics into it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; I did not mean it in that sense.

Mr. HOWELL. This is a question of business, not of politics.

Mr. SMOOT. I remember that when it was decided to purchase that property the statement was made on the other side of the Chamber that it would be about the best-paying piece of road in the United States, that an immense amount of coal would be produced there, that an immense amount of ore was produced there, and that it ought to be part of the system.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not include me in that statement. I have fought the whole thing for 23 years, ever since I have been here.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is one of the very few Senators here, I will say, who stood by me in trying to defeat this whole thing; but the Government has taken it over. The people have been told to come to Alaska——

Mr. KING. But they have been leaving.

Mr. SMOOT. And now we are caught in a trap. What shall we do?

I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that this is not the way to deal with the matter. I have not any objection to his making his speech to-day on this bill. Then I should like to see the whole subject brought up here and thrashed out on a separate bill, not on an appropriation bill. Then the people of Alaska will receive notice and we will get the information right up to the present moment.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator from Utah that this is not the place to begin—right now—to notify the United States Smelting, Refining & Mining Co. that they can expect the United States Senate to handle this proposition in a businesslike manner on behalf of the people of the United States, and not continue to operate a narrow-gauge road that is no integral part of the Alaska Railway for their benefit and profit.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator must know that the mining company can take care of itself a great deal better than the thousands of people there that are depending upon it.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, one of the remarkable things about this matter is that the distinguished Senator from Utah appeals to your sympathies for "thousands of people" in Alaska. Remember, now, there are only 8,000 people in all that region within 150 miles of this railroad on either side, including all the people around Fairbanks, and 3,000 are there because of the railroad. Therefore we are operating that railroad for the benefit of these 5,000 people. Suppose that we did as much for an equal number of people wherever found in the United States; do you know how much railroad we would be operating right now? Seven million five hundred thousand miles. If we did the same thing for the same number of people all throughout the United States, do you know what our annual deficit would be? Fifteen billion dollars. There may be 4,000 people in the Fairbanks district; I doubt it; but if there are 4,000 people, we ought to think of the many other 4,000 people within this country and treat them as fairly as those in Alaska.

Mr. President, it is a well-recognized fact that there is just one industry at Fairbanks, and that is the mining of gold. It is a well-recognized fact also that there are no paying lode mines in the Fairbanks district, that the source of the gold is placers.

It is also a well-known fact that these placers have been largely exhausted. Thus, in 1910 Fairbanks produced $10,000,000 in gold, but in 1926 it produced only $519,000. After placer miners have swept the bedrock of their claims there follows, not infrequently, the mechanical vulture to pick the bones of these exhausted placers. These mechanical vultures are great dredges. That is what the United States Smelting, Refining & Mining Co. are doing now. They are setting up dredges for the final feast. They are not building up an industry. Their activity means that the dream is all but over, the end of the rainbow is at hand. And the bones they leave are just about as inspiriting as those left by the vultures of the air.

Are we to help finance these mechanical vultures? That is the question that is before us now. Are we to pay the expenses of the operation of this short-line railroad there, so that this company can make larger dividends for its stockholders next year? They have had a very profitable career, Mr. President; for after you allow for the preferred stock of the United States Smelting, Refining & Mining Co. and all else you find that they have for their common-stock holders a surplus remaining of about $37,700,000.

Mr. President, it is this kind of organization that is influencing Congress constantly. Are we to continue to submit to it? Are we to pass this bill and say to the people of the United States, "We are financing that narrow-gauge road up there for the United States Smelting, Refining & Mining Co. for another year"?

Let us stop now, Mr. President, because this company is perfectly able to operate that road itself if it sees fit to do so. We can offer to lease it to the company for $10,000 a year, or, if it will not pay that, for a dollar a year.

Mr. SMOOT. Not without legislation.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, it is suggested that we can not do this without legislation. It is easy enough to put through the necessary legislation, because this appropriation bill is for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929. We never should pay another dollar for the operation of the Chatanika branch. The history of that branch already is replete with—well, with disgrace.

Do you know what they did when this Alaskan Railroad was building? Those who were interested in getting the United States to buy these two railroads were so afraid that Congress might rescind its action that they did not wait for us to build the road from the south end only—that is, from Seward north. It is an amazing thing that they prevailed upon the Government to build from both ends, that the rails and supplies which were used to build from this north end were shipped in over the White Horse Pass, down the Yukon River, then up the Tanana, at an expense of from $70 to $80 a ton for freight alone. Are we to continue this sort of thing? We have the opportunity now to stop it; and the curtailment I am suggesting is not the only curtailment that ought to be made, and that must be made, and that Senators will make when they understand this problem.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I am very much interested in what the Senator has been saying. When the original proposition was up for the construction by the Government of the railroad in Alaska, I remember that the amount authorized was $35,000,000. I was in the other body at the time, and was very much concerned about whether it was a project that we ought to undertake. We went into it very thoroughly. I was clearly convinced that the possibilities of it were such that we were justified in doing it, and voted without very much hesitation in the belief that it would develop in a manner that would be justifiable. I have not followed the additional expenses. I heard the Senator say a while ago something about $50,000,000.

Mr. HOWELL. Fifty seven million three hundred thousand in total, I understand.

Mr. FESS. That the Government has invested?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes; that is, without its losses due to interest and deficits.

Mr. FESS. That is a considerable excess over what was originally appropriated.

Mr. HOWELL. The losses due to interest and deficits are about $31,000,000 more.

Mr. FESS. The question with me is that unless we proceed to open up by transportation facilities those portions of Alaska that offer wealth, a good portion of this, if not all of it, would be lost; and I have wondered whether we would be justified in not making the necessary appropriations to proceed with the development of Alaska. I want the Senator to know that I have an open mind on the matter. I am asking for information.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senator was not in the Chamber when I began my statement, I shall briefly restate my view respecting this problem.

I do not advocate scuttling so far as this railroad is concerned. What I am advocating is its curtailment to a minimum, yet allowing it to perform the duty of development, if further development is practicable.

The pending amendment is merely one that provides that no part of this money shall be expended to maintain and operate a narrow-gauge railroad, extending northeast from Fairbanks 39 miles, which is now being operated for the benefit, practically solely, of the United States Smelting, Refining & Mining Co. My proposal now, so far as this amendment is concerned, is that we shall no longer operate this narrow-gauge railroad for the benefit of this company, but shall let them operate it themselves at their own expense.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. What amount of money will be required to operate and maintain this road which the Senator is discussing?

Mr. HOWELL. The director of the railroad reports that it will cost, if I remember rightly, in the neighborhood of fifty or sixty thousand dollars to operate it this coming year. He estimates that the income will fall short something like 25 per cent. Of course, it is relatively a small matter, but in my opinion the manager of this short-line railroad, who is very anxious to continue to operate the railroad—as I know, because I have discussed the matter with him—is oversanguine respecting the size of the deficit that will result from its continued operation.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the Senator's amendment shall be adopted, as I understand it, it will save the Government about $60,000?

Mr. HOWELL. No; on the basis of the statement——

Mr. HEFLIN. About $30,000?

Mr. HOWELL. The statement of the general manager, which includes no depreciation, shows that possibly it will cost the Government above income $15,000 to operate that railroad.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then the Senator's amendment would save the Government that amount?

Mr. HOWELL. That amount. But, Mr. President, this is the first step which I think we ought to take in the curtailment of this railroad, and certainly there can be no question as to this particular step.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I suppose everybody admits that the sanguine hopes entertained at the time this enterprise was undertaken have fallen deplorably short of realization. It was anticipated that the construction of this line of railroad would promote the development of the coal properties in that neighborhood, represented to us as being of immense value. It was believed that the coal was of a very high character and would be serviceable for fueling the Navy, and that it would command a very large market all up and down the Pacific coast.

It was also expected that the region adjacent to the road would be speedily settled by homesteaders of a high class, and that the development of the Territory would go on speedily. There has been practically no development of the coal mines, or nothing of any consequence, and there has been no settlement of the adjacent territory. Disappointments of that kind may reasonably be expected, but I was not expecting to hear anything like the statement now made by the Senator from Nebraska, that supplies and equipment were hauled up over the pass and transported down the Yukon River at a cost of $80 a ton.

I want to ask the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who has served on the Committee on Appropriations ever since this railroad was built, whether there has been any investigation by any of the branches of Congress into the construction of the railroad, and the cost of the management of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Only by the Committee on Appropriations requiring the officials operating the railroad to come before it and explain to the committee why the appropriations have been necessary. The Senator was not in the Chamber when we discussed the matter briefly a short time ago. I can say to him that I have not been disappointed, because the result is just about as I said it would be at the time the legislation was before this body. But I did think that the conditions would be better than they have proven to be.

As I said, if this amendment shall be adopted, it will only add more to the expense to which the Government will be put to operate the railroad, if it is to be operated.

The overhead expenses, the cost of all the cars, and the expenses for all of the men operating the road, outside of the men who keep the road in repair, would be just the same. Now, every dollar taken in on that road—and a great part of the whole revenue comes from that section—would immediately be cut off, and all the balance of the road would have to make up the loss of revenue ordinarily coming from that source, besides the deficit they already have.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator from Nebraska has the facts aright, the mining company which operates at the upper terminus of the road would be obliged to operate the road.

Mr. SMOOT. That would not make any difference in the statement I made. To-day the railroad has authority to use every dollar that is taken in by the railroad toward paying its expenses. If we cut that off, of course, that will be taken out of the amount the railroad has to pay for operation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did not care to enter into a discussion particularly about this little branch road.

Let me ask the Senator from Nebraska if he can give us the information as to what tonnage the coal mines supply the road.

Mr. HOWELL. The only coal that is supplied is that used by these 8,000 people who are within 150 miles of this railroad.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is no exportation of coal at all?

Mr. HOWELL. There is no exportation of coal at all.

Mr. SMOOT. It has been a flat failure, I will say to the Senator. The only question now is as to the policy to be pursued.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me inquire of the Senator from Nebraska whether in his judgment the facts warrant a thorough investigation of the whole subject?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I will say that I have in mind, following this discussion, the submission of a resolution for such an investigation.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator will offer such a resolution, and I would like to see the whole thing investigated. I am quite sure the officials of the railroad will not object. They have painted the picture to the committee just as black, it seems to me, as it is possible to paint it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If there was any such reckless expenditure of money in the construction of the road as is to be inferred from the information given us by the Senator from Nebraska, I think we should promptly inquire into it.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, it is not claimed by anybody that this shipment of rails which the Senator from Nebraska has described is attributable in any way to the present management of this railroad. He is talking about the construction of the railroad, back about 1912 or 1913. It is not claimed there is any such proceeding as that now.

With reference to the shipment of coal, perhaps I could give the Senator a little information. I chance to recall that there is one company in Fairbanks that has contracted with the Healy River Coal Co. for 40,000 tons of coal next year, so that there is evidently some tonnage in sight.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Where is that coal to be mined?

Mr. WILLIS. At the Healy River. I could point it out to the Senator on the map. It is south from Nenana.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Ohio has spoken of 40,000 tons of coal which they have contracted for, and we might assume that the freight would be about four or five dollars a ton. That would amount to about $150,000 or $200,000 a year.

Mr. SMOOT. About $160,000.

Mr. HOWELL. That can not justify the operation of a railroad whose deficit on account of expenses alone exceeds a million dollars. I sincerely trust that the amendment which I have offered to this bill will be adopted.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I sincerely trust that the amendment will not be adopted, and in brief form I shall try to set forth my views upon this question.

In the first place, the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, as he has stated, is only a part of his program. He proposes not only to curtail the Alaska Railroad, but to "curhead" it as well, because, as he has stated to me, he is of opinion that another section of the railroad ought to be abandoned. Just for the present I want to address myself to this amendment, and particularly to the remarks which have been made by the Senator from Nebraska.

A good deal his been said about the American Smelting Co. I know nothing about it. I never heard of it. I care nothing about it. I never knew, until the Senator made the statement here, that it had any relation to the Fairbanks Exploration Co., and I know nothing of that company, and care nothing about it, except as it has relationship to Alaska and its people.

I care nothing about these various special interests which gentlemen have tried to make a bugaboo, but I do care immensely about this great Territory and the interests of the United States therein; and I care very much about the fine people who are living in Alaska and trying to develop there in that well-nigh forgotten empire what may, I hope, some time become a State of this American Union.

I think the last thing the friends of Alaska should do is to interpose against this railroad. The one thing that is needed in Alaska more than anything else is the development of better means of transportation. If this first amendment proposed by the Senator shall be adopted, this section of the road from Fairbanks on to Chatanika, some thirty-odd miles, is to be abandoned, as I understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution (S. Res. 128) submitted by Mr. LA FOLLETTE relating to presidential terms.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in order that the matter concerning the appropriation bill which has been under discussion may be disposed of, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, the effect of the amendment now pending is to abandon the 39 miles of railroad from Fairbanks out to Chatanika. In the first place, I know nothing about the way in which that road was constructed. I care nothing about that. The fact that appeals to me is that we are there; that we own this section of railroad; and in my judgment we ought to operate it for the benefit of the American people. I am not one of those willing to concede that the ownership of Alaska by the United States Government or the people of the United States is a failure and that we ought to give up the Alaska Railroad piecemeal.

The Senator said, as I understood him, that he thinks the operation of that section of the road is not profitable. As a matter of fact, if the same logic is to be applied, it is admitted that the operation of the whole road in a financial way is unprofitable because, as I showed in the statistics which I quoted, while the deficit is being decreased from year to year, from $1,800,000 in 1924 down to $900,000 in 1927, it is yet a deficit; so that if we proceed on the theory that any section of the road which shows a deficit is to be abandoned, then the logic of the Senator's position is that we should abandon the whole road and go out of business there.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COUZENS in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WILLIS. I am glad always to yield to my friend from Nebraska.

Mr. HOWELL. I would like to ask the distinguished Senator from Ohio if he has read the report and pored over the statistics of the railroad, and, further, I would like to ask him if, having done it, he has determined what the $400,000 additional, over and above the $900,000 that is estimated for, is to be used for in connection with the railroad?

Mr. WILLIS. I can say that I have given some attention to that matter. I have gone over the reports pretty carefully. I have talked with officials of the Government. I do not mind admitting that I have walked some scores of miles over the Alaska Railroad and am rather familiar with its construction.

Mr. NORRIS rose.

Mr. WILLIS. Just a moment, if the Senator please. As to the amount of $400,000 and what it is to be used for, I am told that at least $100,000 of it is to be used in expenditure for the purchase of new cars, largely freight cars, to handle the coal business for next year.

I now yield to the senior Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has passed the point. When he said he had walked over the Alaska Railroad I wanted to ask whether he did not have money enough to pay his fare, or how did he happen to be put off the train? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. I think that would be a very embarrassing question, and the Senator ought not to ask it in view of all the circumstances. [Laughter.]

As I said, $100,000 is to be used in the purchase of new cars. It is specifically stated by officials that to handle the coal business in sight for the next year in this country—they have contracted now for the purchase of 40,000 tons of coal for next year—they have to have additional cars to carry the coal, and they are buying cars with that money. The $100,000 will go for the purchase of additional freight equipment. Some of it went last year for the purchase of two new locomotives.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. HOWELL. Is it not a fact that $14,000 is asked for new coal cars?

Mr. WILLIS. The fact is as I have stated it, as I understand it.

Mr. HOWELL. I am sorry to say that the distinguished Senator from Ohio is mistaken. The amount suggested for coal cars is $14,000.

Mr. WILLIS. I said coal cars and passenger cars. I have before me a memorandum prepared by Government officials, as follows, and I will read a paragraph for the erudition of the Senator:

> Nearly $100,000 of this amount is required for additional freight and passenger cars to take care of increasing traffic. Ten new coal cars are included. An increase of coal traffic into Fairbanks to the extent of at least 40,000 tons a year is expected, that amount having been contracted for by one company alone.
> An investment amounting to several hundred thousand dollars has been made by that company in a power plant and distribution lines, which are dependent upon the coal supply hauled by the railroad. The total investment of the same company in that vicinity is said to be about $9,000,000.
> During the last fiscal year over 3 miles of wooden bridges and trestles of the railroad were filled or replaced with steel structures on concrete foundations. For a continuation of this work the management plans to utilize at least $170,000 out of the $400,000 requested. The result of this work will be a constant reduction in expense of repairing bridges and trestles, which is heavy in the case of wooden structures.
> As an example of what can be done with money appropriated for capital expenditures the railroad purchased last year two Mikado locomotives of modern type, which operate at no greater expense than the older type in use but haul twice the load.
> The balance of the sum of $400,000 is made up of minor items of improvements believed to be necessary to meet the demands of traffic and to carry on the program of reducing expenses of operation.
> I am informed by residents of Alaska that it would be a severe blow to the entire territory tributary to the railroad to abandon any part of the railroad as located and constructed from Seward to Fairbanks. The problems of industrial and agricultural development of that section are gradually being worked out; to this purpose hundreds of individuals, as well as the United States Government, have devoted much labor, time, and money, which would largely be lost if the retrogressive action of abandoning important parts of the railroad line should be taken. The mere threat of such action is injurious.
> Substantial progress is being made from year to year in increasing the revenues and decreasing the expenses of the railroad. The rate of this progress has been greater, I believe, than in the case of any other railroad operated under the flag of the United States; if any railroad in the States could show such rapid progress, it would be most encouraging to its security holders. The investment of the United States Government in the Alaska Railroad is an investment not only in the physical property of the railroad but in the entire territory tributary to the railroad, is a substantial factor in the prosperity of the people of various sections of the States as well as Alaska, and is making possible a solution of many of the physical, political, and economic problems involved in the development of our last frontier.

That is the source of my information.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIS. I want to tell the Senator about that $400,000, but he will not let me proceed.

Mr. HOWELL. I would like to comment on the car question, because the Senator has suggested that it is not only coal cars but passenger cars. As a matter of fact, the detailed estimate is for passenger cars $15,000 and for coal cars $14,000, making a total of $29,000.

Mr. WILLIS. That does not at all controvert my position. What I am trying to show to the Senate, if I can get a chance to do it, is that the $400,000 is to be expended as it would be expended by any other railroad, some of it for passenger cars and some of it for coal cars. Last year, I happen to recall, they purchased two new heavy locomotives to take the place of light locomotives that had been in use upon the railroad before.

Mr. HOWELL. Was that a capital expenditure or was it a replacement?

Mr. WILLIS. That was capital expenditure. Here is another thing: Some of this money will undoubtedly be used in the purchase of new ties in that section of the road which the Senator eventually wants to abandon, as I recall. It is not fair to say that——

Mr. HOWELL. Is that a capital expenditure?

Mr. WILLIS. Wait a moment. A portion of that is to go for the purchase of ties to put into better condition the section of road the Senator wants to abandon eventually, because I understand it to be his purpose not only to cut off the section from Fairbanks up to Chatanika, but eventually to cut off the section from Fairbanks to Nenana, and then, having "curtailed" the railroad at that end, he would behead it at the other end and cut off the section from Anchorage down to Seward and leave only the central portion, which could, of course, never be developed.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. NEELY. I assume that if the 40 miles of railroad were discontinued, it would be very difficult for a delegate from Alaska to get to Kansas City for the next National Republican Convention. I assume also, the Senator having walked over the railroad, that he has arranged for those delegates to be on hand at the proper time.

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly; and I trust the Senator does me credit to assume that I have arranged for them to be selected at convenient points and that they are now on their way. [Laughter.]

To go into this matter still further—I yield to the Senator from Kansas! [Laughter.]

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I merely want to know if the Senator wants the delegates to leave before the road is abandoned? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. It does not make any difference, because my delegates are picked out from convenient points.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to know how the next President from Kansas feels about this 46 miles of Alaska Railroad? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. To go still further into the matter seriously, here is another important fact entirely overlooked by the Senator from Nebraska. He was at Fairbanks in 1923, and evidently he has been reading reports about Alaska and statistics about Alaska ever since then. But he has not at all kept in touch with what has been going on in Alaska. If he thinks that Chatanika is now what it was in 1923 he is quite mistaken. That is one of busiest centers of industry I have ever seen. He referred to a company that frightened him so much, a company I had never heard of before. I want to say, incidentally, that I decline to abandon a railroad simply because some company has expended the sum of $9,000,000 or $10,000,000 in developing the country adjacent thereto. That, to my mind, does not appeal at all.

In the period since 1923 there has been a tremendous development there, and, as I was about to say, that area is one of the most active and busy industrial sections I have ever seen. The Fairbanks Exploration Co. has expended some $9,000,000 or $10,000,000 already in getting ready to proceed with its placer mining which the Senator from Nebraska describes. It would be interesting if the Senate had time to go into that matter. They have gone back into the mountains 80 miles and tapped a stream of water and brought it in a canal down the mountain side until there it is at a height of several hundred feet, so they are prepared to do hydraulic mining.

As a result of that work there is a rapidly developing population at Chatanika, which I myself visited. It is a busy town, with more people coming there, and yet just at this time, when the development is on and the people are there and need the facilities for transportation, the Senator from Nebraska comes in and says we must abandon this railroad.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly I yield to my friend.

Mr. HOWELL. I wish to call the attention of the distinguished Senator that in 1924 the Fairbanks region produced in gold $781,000. In 1925 things were flourishing tremendously, but they only produced $604,000. In 1926 they kept on flourishing, just as the Senator is suggesting, but they only produced $519,000. Whereas—I have not the figures—I assume that this last year their production was down to $460,000, not one-half of what we spend to make up the deficit of the railroad for one year.

Mr. WILLIS. Of course, that is perfectly logical. I have just been describing to the Senator the fact that this exploration company has spent $10,000,000 getting ready to begin its mining project, and he says they have not produced anything yet. Of course not. Their work is just starting now, and because they have not yet produced he says it is a perfectly useless thing to carry on the operation of the railroad. But the Senator is not quite accurate in his figures. I have before me the report of the Governor of Alaska, which shows that from the fourth district last year there was a production of silver and gold, and the silver is practically nothing, of $945,000.

Mr. HOWELL. The fourth district includes a tremendous territory in addition to that around Fairbanks.

Mr. WILLIS. Of course, but the Senator has been talking about the Fairbanks region, whatever that is. That takes in a good deal of territory. I am talking about the same territory, and it does not make any difference, so far as the argument is concerned, whether it is $400,000 or $900,000. What I am saying to the Senator is that I think he is doing a tremendous injustice to a growing population that is undertaking to develop this country when he says we should go in and stop the operation of this railroad.

Mr. HOWELL. The Senator has suggested that I am not accurate because I stated that in 1926 the Fairbanks region, to which we are referring—and when I refer to the Fairbanks region I mean any territory within 100 miles or more of Fairbanks—produced only $519,000.

Mr. WILLIS. Well, what of it?

Mr. HOWELL. Simply this, that the placer development there has gone steadily down hill until now the Senator tells us the United States Smelting, Refining & Mining Co. has gone in there and spent $10,000,000 around Chatanika. They need this branch of narrow-gauge railroad, 39 miles long, and the Senator says we ought to operate it at our expense instead of letting them operate it at their expense.

Mr. WILLIS. I prefer to make my own speech and to draw my own conclusions. I, of course, said nothing of the kind. In the first place, I am not responsible and the Senator is not responsible for this short line of railroad. It was purchased by the Government of the United States many years ago. Simply because some American business men, whoever or wherever they may be, have taken enough interest in this matter to expend $10,000,000 there in developing the country, I am not going to get frightened about it and say, "Because they have invested $10,000,000 there must be something terrible going on; let us abandon the railroad." I am not proposing that it shall be operated for the benefit of this company, but I am proposing that it shall be continued to be operated for the men, women, and children who live in Chatanika, out yonder upon the frontier, living the American life and trying to develop an American community, which the Senator from Nebraska proposes to abandon.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Ohio a question?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CARAWAY. If I remember correctly, the Senator from Ohio was one of the most eloquent opponents of the Government maintaining a merchant marine. Was not that true?

Mr. WILLIS. I may have to call upon the Senator to prove that, for I have been very greatly criticized by the distinguished Senator right to his rear because I voted for the so-called Jones bill the other day.

Mr. CARAWAY. But the Senator made a speech against it, did he not?

Mr. WILLIS. No. I offered some amendments to it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I was under the impression that the Senator was opposed to the Government being in business.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, so much for the amendment that is pending here just now. Recapitulating, we are simply proposing to continue the operation of a road that we find the Government of the United States owns. If it shall be said that this whole line of road is of very questionable economic value, let me point out that one of the most certain ways to destroy it is to lop off one section after another, as the Senator from Nebraska has in mind to do, because I have no doubt that as soon as the pending amendment shall have been voted on he will offer another one proposing to abandon the section of the road from Seward to Anchorage, making Anchorage the southern terminus; and then eventually he will, I presume, offer another amendment cutting off the section from Fairbanks down to Nenana. Of course, that would be one of the finest ways in the world to increase the facilities of the Alaska Railroad! Suppose we should say to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, "You are a good railroad all right; we want to encourage you; and in order to help you along we will provide, first, that you shall not operate any trains between Cumberland and Washington or between Myersdale and Pittsburgh, but the remainder of the line you can run all right. If you do not make money then, we are going to put you out of business." That would be just about the same proposal as that which the Senator from Nebraska is making here.

Now, Mr. President, I wish more fully to answer one objection that was made here, and that was that the maintenance of this road is neglected. If Senators personally had more practical knowledge of this railroad they would be less rash in their statements. Within six months I have been over every foot of the Alaska Railroad. I know of its condition. Any Senator who says that maintenance has been neglected is simply making a statement that is not at all sustained by the facts.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIS. Just a moment. With reference to the $400,000, which has worried the Senators so much, let me say another thing. I saw personally within the last year several miles of wooden trestles and bridges—I shall have before me in a moment the exact number of miles. Three miles of wooden bridges and wooden trestles were replaced with steel structures; I myself saw scores of them. Some of this money will undoubtedly be used in that way; yet the Senator seems to think it is an inexcusably unwise expenditure of the people's money to make a railroad safe for the transportation of commerce and of passengers. Now I yield to my friend from Nebraska.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Ohio is hardly accurate when he states that I have insisted that maintenance has been neglected. There are two kinds of maintenance: One is the maintenance that can be applied each year to a structure, and the other is deferred maintenance that it is impossible to apply. For instance, a wooden trestle may gradually depreciate and be replaced, as the Senator has suggested, by a steel bridge. That is deferred maintenance. The Senator tells us distinctly that the Alaska Railroad is going to use this $400,000 for doing that sort of thing. That is what I insisted, and yet they say that it is chargeable to capital.

Mr. WILLIS. Why is it not?

Mr. HOWELL. A portion of it might be, but a portion of it is maintenance. However, they make no such distinction and they tell you frankly, "We do not set up any depreciation reserve account whatever." What they say is to be used for capital purposes is in fact, at least partially, to be used to make good deferred maintenance. That must be admitted.

Mr. WILLIS. Let me answer that suggestion; let us see whether it is proper to consider any portion of this as capital expenditure. There are sections of that railroad which were not well constructed at the outset and which are not now in such very good condition. As I observed it during a considerable time in the Territory, the poorest section of the railroad is between Fairbanks and Nenana. It is proposed to use a portion of this money to put in new ties. The ties which were used in the first instance were largely birch and other woods which were light and not of very long life. Now they are putting in better and more durable ties. Likewise in long stretches there were wooden trestles. Why did they use wooden trestles? Because that was the lightest and cheapest construction when they were putting in the road. Now, however, gradually miles of wooden trestles and bridges are being superseded by concrete structures and steel bridges. In other words, the work of construction had not been fully completed, and yet the Senator proposes to charge, I suppose, the great steel bridge over the Tanana River at Nenana as a matter of maintenance because originally they put up a light wooden bridge there.

I can understand the attitude of anyone who wants to break down the railroad and abandon Alaska, but I can not understand the attitude of Senators who believe the people of Alaska need aid, as they openly admit, who want to abandon this railroad, to hamstring it, destroy its property, and discourage the people of Alaska and make impossible the development of that Territory.

Mr. HOWELL. I am sorry, Mr. President, to call the Senator's attention to another inaccuracy. There never was a wooden bridge constructed across the Tanana River at Nenana.

Mr. WILLIS. Well, there were hundreds of them elsewhere. I used that merely as an illustration.

Mr. HOWELL. And that was a peculiar case, because that bridge cost $1,500,000.

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; and it is a very good bridge and worth the money.

Mr. HOWELL. It is an excellent steel structure with a timber approach. But at first trains were taken across the river at that point on the ice. It was only toward the end of the construction of the railroad that that bridge was built, and it never ought to have been built.

I have simply called attention to this fact, because the Senator would give the impression that I was not informed and that he was. I do not pretend to know much about this railroad, but there are some things I do know, because I have made a study of it not only at the time I was there but since I have returned.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I am satisfied that the Senator has given full demonstration of the fact that he is not informed. I am glad I gave him time for that purpose.

If the bridge over the Tanana River was not a wooden bridge there are scores of other places where they built light wooden bridges and where within the past year they have replaced them by steel bridges as a matter of improved construction. I think that is a perfectly legitimate expense, and a proposed expenditure for the continuation of that work next year is likewise perfectly legitimate and justifiable.

One other thing, Mr. President, I wish to say, and then I am ready for a vote upon this question. I call attention, first, to the fact that the Alaska Railroad has been well managed. Implication has been made here, suspicion has been thrown out that there is something mysterious or something wrong, something that should be investigated about the present management of this road. If the Senator from Nebraska or anybody else wants to delve into ancient tomes and investigate what was going on in the construction of this road along about 1912, 1913, and 1914 I have not the slightest objection in the world, but I do object to the imputation that there is anything wrong with the present efficient management of the Alaska Railroad.

For example, I notice that the freight revenue on the Alaska Railroad in 1924 was $433,000; in 1925 it was $412,000—a slight decrease—in 1926 it was $566,000; in 1927 it was $811,000. Their freight revenue is increasing. Let us consider the results in connection not only with the freight hauled upon the railroad but the freight carried upon the line of boats that is run upon the Yukon and the Tanana Rivers. In 1924 the total rail and water revenue was $907,000; in 1925 there was a little decrease, the revenue being $861,000; but in 1926 it went up to $1,067,000, and last year to $1,339,000; so that the income from the railroad under the present management is increasing every year, and the deficit, as I have already pointed out and placed the figures in the RECORD, is decreasing.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to my friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLAINE. Are these losses due to the incompetency or inefficiency of the agents of the Government?

Mr. WILLIS. I think that is a perfectly proper question. Of course, I am not a railroad expert as the Senator is not, but, so far as I could judge and so far as I could gain the information from various sources, I never heard the suggestion from anybody that the management of the road or its employees, its workingmen, its officials, were guilty of any incompetency or inefficiency. I really think they are pretty well up to the standard. I might say that a situation exists there which the Senator will understand. A good many of the day laborers who work on the road are Indians, and very properly so, and at the start they were not accustomed to that type of labor and perhaps could not be compared to similar laborers in the United States proper, but they come to be very good workmen. I have talked with them and watched them do their work, and they are pretty good workmen. As for the bridge builders, I will say to the Senator that the bridge crews are the most efficient that I ever saw on any railroad anywhere.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. If this railroad were abandoned by the Government, could private interests operate it more economically?

Mr. WILLIS. Of course, that is a question no man can answer with certainty, but I doubt it. The question the Senator has propounded goes deep into this matter. The people of the United States have put their hand to the plow upon this proposition.

There may have been some mistakes in the construction of the road. Perhaps they ought not to have hauled these rails up over the White Horse Pass. I do not know. I was not there. The fact is, however, that we have the railroad, and we have Alaska, and we ought to be proud that we have Alaska, because it is an empire of the resources of which the people of this country have not yet dreamed.

The Senator talks about coal, and wonders whether there is any coal in Alaska. I am of fairly good height. I stood before an outcropping vein of coal 47 feet thick and looked up at it, and I said to the operator of that mine, Evan Jones—of course, you could not think of a coal mine if you did not have a man by the name of Jones or Owens or Griffith about it—I said to him, "What is the total thickness of the veins that you are operating here now?" He computed a moment, and he said, "260 feet." The thinnest vein that he was operating was 25 feet, and that over an area of hundreds of square miles; and yet Senators speak slightingly of Alaska, and wonder whether it really is worth while, or whether we ought not just to scuttle and get out of it.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, is not that lignite coal?

Mr. WILLIS. A portion of it is lignite coal. In the Chickaloon district it is not lignite coal; it is hard coal, as the Senator knows; and in the Matanuska district there is excellent coal; the Healy River coal is lignite coal, which is being consumed in that country, and which does not have to be washed to get the slate out of it, as the Senator said.

Mr. HOWELL. The hard coal that the Senator spoke of, though——

Mr. WILLIS. That has not been largely developed.

Mr. HOWELL. But they have washers in there, have they not?

Mr. WILLIS. They did have, and perhaps have yet. In these things I have an old-fashioned habit of talking about only the things that I know. I know about the Healy River mine, because I have visited it, and saw it in operation with modern mining machinery; and yet Senators write interrogation points, and wonder whether there is any coal there, or whether it is worth bothering with at all.

Then the Senator and others have spoken rather doubtfully about this region in here. "How many people live there?" Well, I have ridden over good, long stretches of the Santa Fe Railroad and the Union Pacific Railroad where there were not very many people living, and where, at any rate, there were practically no people living when that road was building. Did they, therefore, say, "We will just chop out that section of the road, and not have any road there"?

Mr. President, we have the same problem in Alaska that we had in Kansas and Nebraska 75 years ago and in Montana and Idaho 40 years ago. The only question is whether we shall have the vision and the American spirit to go ahead with the solution of this problem, or whether we shall be frightened by gentlemen who cry out, "Oh, there is a corporation that has bought up some of this land! Let us chop off this portion of the railroad; and down here, somewhere else, it might have been built a little cheaper; so let us cut off that section of the railroad," and finally destroy and emasculate the whole property so that that vast empire shall lie there for yet other generations, untouched and undeveloped.

That is the program of the Senator. I am opposed to it, and therefore trust that his amendment will be defeated.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Barkley	Frazier	McMaster	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-six Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum is present.

Mr. SMOOT. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 108, in line 14, following the word "road," insert: "excluding the Chatanika narrow-gauge branch extending northeast from Fairbanks."

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I wish to state that this amendment will in no way injure or retard the development of the region north of Fairbanks. It simply provides that a narrow-gauge road, which is not an integral part of the Alaska Railroad, shall not be longer operated at the expense of the people of the United States, and that if the United States Smelting, Mining & Refining Co. wants the use of that road it can operate it at its own expense. That is the purpose and object and will be the effect of this amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I shall take only a moment, and shall take it only because of the statement just made.

I think the statement of the Senator from Nebraska is not at all justified by the facts when he says this amendment will have no effect upon the development of the territory north of Fairbanks. It will have the most disastrous effect upon it, because his proposal is to abandon this railroad, which is now furnishing service to a rapidly developing community.

I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL].

Mr. WILLIS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WAGNER (when his name was called). I desire to transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND]. If my colleague [Mr. COPELAND] were present, he would vote in the affirmative. I therefore vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TYSON];

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]; and

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. PINE] with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania (after having voted in the negative). Has the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. GOULD] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. FESS. I am paired with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRIS]. He is unavoidably detained from the Senate by illness. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I wish to announce the necessary absence by reason of illness of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

I wish also to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] are detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 56, as follows:

So Mr. HOWELL's amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. KING. I beg to inquire whether, under the unanimous-consent agreement, further amendments may be offered to the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will hold that any amendment relating to this particular railroad will be in order now.

Mr. KING. In view of that announcement, would a motion to strike out the entire item be proper?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will hold any motion referring to the Alaska Railroad to be in order.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Of course, I defer to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HOWELL. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After line 15, on page 109, insert the following:

And also provided further, That no portion of said $400,000 shall be expended on that portion of the Alaska Railroad between Seward and Anchorage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, an examination of the Alaska Railroad indicates that it divides into three parts, the first extending from Seward 114 miles to Anchorage. Seward is upon the Gulf of Alaska. Anchorage is upon Cook Inlet, an arm of the Gulf of Alaska.

The second section extends from Anchorage north to Nenana, located on the Tanana River. This section is 296 miles in length, and unites the waters of the Gulf of Alaska via Cook Inlet with the 3,000 miles of navigation of the Yukon and its tributaries.

Prior to the building of this section of road freight that was shipped into Fairbanks went up through Chatham Strait, up over White Horse Pass, and down the Yukon River to the mouth of the Tanana River, and then up the Tanana River to Fairbanks; or it went around the Peninsula of Alaska, up to the mouth of the Yukon River, and up the Yukon to the Tanana, and thence to Fairbanks. The route usually utilized was over White Horse Pass and down the Yukon River to the Tanana River, and then up the Tanana to Fairbanks.

The cost of transporting freight over this route was about $80 a ton, and it was under these conditions that Fairbanks was developed and continued in the heyday of its prosperity. In 1910 $10,000,000 of gold was taken out of that particular region. Since then the placers have been exhausted, so that in the year 1926 the total gold produced was only about $519,000, or less than one-half of the deficit we are asked to make good this year in connection with the Alaska Railroad.

The third section of the Railroad extends from Nenana on the Tanana River to Fairbanks. That section was the last section built. Prior to the construction of that section, freight went to Nenana, and then by river to Fairbanks, about 50 miles.

There was a narrow-gauge road built by private interests out northeast from Fairbanks to Chatanika, to which I have already referred, and it is a remarkable fact that after the Government acquired this property our engineers extended that narrow-gauge road down to a point opposite Nenana on the Tanana River, and for a time freight was shipped in over the broad-gauge road up to Nenana, there carried across the river, and then by the narrow gauge delivered to Fairbanks.

Shortly after the narrow gauge was completed to Nenana it was determined to make it a broad gauge, and the Government then went to the expense of transforming this 56 miles of narrow-gauge road into a broad-gauge road, although at that time there were but 1,100 people in Fairbanks. Moreover, the engineers proceeded to construct a bridge across the Tanana River at an expense of $1,500,000.

Mr. President, I believe in development; I believe in doing all that is possible for Alaska, but there are certain limits beyond which we should not go, and beyond which it is not necessary to go. The important function of this railroad is connecting the Gulf of Alaska with the navigation of the Yukon River, and that portion of this railroad extending from Anchorage, on Cook Inlet, to Nenana, accomplishes that purpose, and is 296 miles long. The other sections are not necessary to the primary purpose of this railroad, and those sections total 209 miles in length.

It must be evident that if we eliminate this 209 miles of railroad, leaving only 296 to operate, the expense to the Government in maintaining a rail connection between the waters of the Gulf of Alaska and the Yukon River will be reduced to a minimum. I am willing to go forward with the experiment of continuing the operation of this section of railroad until such a time as it may be demonstrated that it is either a hopeless enterprise or a success.

It has been stated by the distinguished Senator from Ohio that I purposed offering amendments to abandon the section north of Nenana to Fairbanks and also the section from Anchorage to Seward. I have had no intention of offering any such amendment at this time and I have none now. I believe there should be such eliminations, and I believe there will be, and the sooner the better it will be for the people of the country and, as a matter of fact, for Alaska. I expect later to propose a resolution calling for an investigation of the conditions under which the railroad is being operated, and I trust the result of such an investigation may afford information to Congress that will enable it to reduce to a minimum the current losses due to this enterprise. Furthermore, I believe that one of the things that will result will be the suggestion, if not the recommendation, that the section of the Alaska Railroad extending from Anchorage south to Seward shall be abandoned. Now, in view of such possibilities, ought we to continue making capital expenditures upon this section of the road?

I understand from the office of the Alaska Railway, here in the city, that a large portion of the appropriation proposed for bridges will be used for such structures in the road extending from Anchorage to Seward. Therefore I have offered the pending amendment, which provides, not that the amount which can be expended on account of capital shall be reduced, but that no portion thereof shall be expended upon that section of the railroad between Anchorage and Seward.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire to make some observations in opposition to the amendment, and wish I might have the attention of Senators to the map on the wall for a very brief period. When the other amendment was under discussion I called attention to the fact that the Senator from Nebraska was proposing or he said he was proposing to curtail. Now he is proposing to behead. Look at the map, Senators. It was proposed by the Senator from Nebraska to cut off the most productive section of the road, the one where population is growing most rapidly, the one where there is the most business. That was proposed in the other amendment. It is now proposed that the section of road between Seward and Anchorage shall be put beyond the pale and that no portion of the funds herein appropriated shall be used for the benefit of capital account upon that section of the road.

Now, what is back of that idea? Of course, it is the thought which the Senator has so clearly and earnestly expressed, that Anchorage and not Seward ought to be the terminus of the Alaska Railroad. Why ought not that to be? Here is the first reason: Because God Almighty did not make the country that way. I dislike to say this, because I love the people of Anchorage and wish for them the full realization of their hopes; but it is a physical impossibility ever to make a great port or harbor at Anchorage. Why?

First, because through several months in the year that port is icebound, whereas down at Seward we have the finest harbor or one of the finest harbors in the world, open the year around. There is reason No. 1. Seward is ice-free. Anchorage is frozen over for a portion of the year.

Secondly, the tides at Seward, at Resurrection Bay, that being the name of the harbor, are not troublesome at all. On the other hand, at Cook Inlet, if Senators will look at the map, they will see why the tides must be troublesome. There is one of the highest tides in the world—35 feet. It must be perfectly apparent, therefore, that Cook Inlet, and more particularly neither of these, Knick Arm or Turnagain Arm, is available for natural reasons as a harbor. That is reason No. 2.

Third. I have given some personal attention to this matter. Here at Anchorage the Government at one time spent a considerable sum of money in constructing a pier. With what result? A large ship can not go up to it. Why? Because the streams that flow in there are streams that come down out of the glaciers carrying a tremendous amount of material, and as soon as those rapid glacial streams strike the heavy tide coming in from the sea, of course, that material is deposited, and consequently we have a harbor there that silts up always and will continue to do so until the end of time. To say that the railroad shall terminate there is to say that the ships which go to Alaska can not get in touch with the railroad.

Let us be at least sensible about this thing. If we want to destroy the railroad let us go and blow it up, but let us not adopt a policy that will make it absolutely impossible for anybody to get to the railroad. That is the policy which, unintentionally, of course, is now being advocated by the Senator from Nebraska. It is not possible to make Anchorage the southern terminus of the road without tremendous expenditures to dig out the harbor and then have an annual maintenance charge that is absolutely prohibitive, whereas at Resurrection Bay we have a harbor where the navies of the earth can ride at anchor without ever expending a single penny for excavation.

There is one other reason which, to my mind, is not controlling but which ought not to be overlooked. In the first place, this is the best section of the road, physically speaking. I was over every inch of it, some of it many times, sometimes in conveyances that gave me a very good opportunity to study it. It is in excellent condition. It goes through the most picturesque part of Alaska. Of course, we are not going to build or maintain a railroad simply for the purpose of enabling people to see things, but since we have the railroad there and since the scenery there rivals that of Switzerland, it ought to be taken into consideration if we are proposing to abandon a section of the road.

But I rest my case upon the reasons I have given, that it is absolutely impossible to make Anchorage the proper terminus of the Alaska Railroad, because the harbor freezes over, because of the tremendous tides, and because of the silt. If we are to continue the Alaska Railroad the amendment now offered ought to be voted down.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I know something about the conditions in Alaska, and along Cook Inlet. I can assure the Senate that the suggestions made by the distinguished Senator from Ohio have been so sweeping that if Senators accepted them at their face value they would be misled.

The construction of the Alaska Railroad was begun in 1915. It was begun from Anchorage. From 1915 until 1923, or thereabouts, when they opened the line from Anchorage to Seward the steamships of the Alaskan Steamship Co. entered Cook Inlet and discharged their cargoes at Anchorage. In fact, a large portion of the material required for the construction of a considerable section of the railroad was unloaded at Anchorage. To-day, whenever there is a slide, as there has been, or a washout on that portion of the railroad between Seward to Anchorage, steamships dock at Anchorage even now.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BINGHAM in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the Senator contend that the ocean-going ships, the first-class ships that ply between Alaska and Seattle or San Francisco, can go into Anchorage and go up to the Government pier now?

Mr. HOWELL. I contend, Mr. President, that they can do so now.

Mr. WILLIS. Then they would have to go up on a mud boat, because the water is not more than 7 or 8 feet in places, as I personally know.

Mr. HOWELL. It is evident that the Senator did not fully investigate, because it is well known that there are certain harbors where vessels discharge cargoes, going to their piers at high tide and remaining for a time to discharge their cargoes. They later anchor out and return with the next tide. This is what can be done to-day at Anchorage.

I have here a chart of that portion of Cook Inlet, supplied by the Geodetic Survey, which shows that right across the inlet from Anchorage there is a depth of water of anywhere from 30 to 60 feet.

Mr. WILLIS. But that is across from Anchorage. That is not at Anchorage nor at the pier.

Mr. HOWELL. I am talking about just out of Anchorage. This summer vessels were at the dock in Anchorage discharging their cargoes.

Mr. President, it must be apparent, inasmuch as the total annual income earned by this 500 miles of road amounts to only about $700,000 or $800,000, so far as freight is concerned, that the total is relatively small and hence no unusual facilities are necessary for handling the cargoes that may be involved. Ample facilities can be developed at Anchorage. The section of the railroad extending from Anchorage to Seward is the most expensive of the entire road to maintain. Its grades are so great that one engine can haul only 400 tons over the summit. In the wintertime it is necessary to keep two snowplow crews on the summit all the time in order to keep the road open, and I was assured when there that an engine could haul only about 200 tons over the divide in the wintertime.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] has suggested that we ought to consider the tourists that will come to feast their eyes upon the scenery along this section of the road.

Mr. President, last year the tourists contributed to the maintenance of the entire railroad about $30,000. This is an economic question, and it ought to be regarded by the Senate from a business point of view. I have no prejudices in relation to the matter.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I did not have the benefit of hearing the earlier statement of the Senator from Nebraska. Do I understand his proposition to be that we shall abandon the portion of the road between Seward and Anchorage?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I will state for the benefit of the Senator from California that I believe there should be an investigation of the whole question. I believe that when the whole question shall have been thoroughly canvassed it will be concluded that the United States will be performing its full duty, and more than its duty, to Alaska if it shall maintain the railroad connecting Cook Inlet with navigation on the Yukon River.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. HOWELL. Just a moment. I believe that such a conclusion would be reached. Therefore I do not believe that any further capital expenditures should be made upon that portion of the railroad extending from Anchorage to Seward; therefore my pending amendment provides that none of the $400,000 that is proposed for capital expenditures shall be expended upon that portion of the road.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Even for temporary maintenance?

Mr. HOWELL. No; the appropriation provides $900,000 to meet the deficits due to operation and maintenance, and then adds $400,000 for capital expenditures.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Is the money to be expended in maintaining and operating that road?

Mr. HOWELL. It is for new structures and equipment.

Mr. SMOOT. It is for remodeling, too, I will say, wherever necessary.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Is it to be used for bridges?

Mr. HOWELL. It makes a distinction; it says all the income of the railroad, plus $900,000, may be used for operation and maintenance. Then it says "$400,000 more for capital expenditures."

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Meaning for repairs?

Mr. HOWELL. For new structures and new equipment.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Suppose that some damage occurs in the section of the road referred to which, unless repaired, would cause a complete cessation of operations, the Senator does not contemplate with approval the stopping of operations entirely on that section, does he?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, there is a very marked distinction between appropriations for operation and maintenance and for capital expenditures. If I ask for capital expenditures I mean that I propose to put more capital into the road.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Precisely.

Mr. HOWELL. My idea is that we should maintain the road as it now is until such time as we finally determine what is to be done with that first portion or section.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But suppose a bridge should be burned or should fall down?

Mr. HOWELL. That would be maintenance.

Mr. SMOOT. Or that an engine should be destroyed?

Mr. HOWELL. All that is chargeable to maintenance.

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. HOWELL. I beg pardon. It certainly is.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Suppose an engine runs off the track and a whole train is wrecked or a bridge is burned or collapses for some reason and money is expended for repairs, is not that capital?

Mr. HOWELL. No.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. What would the Senator term that?

Mr. HOWELL. That would be chargeable to the operating income of the road. That would be a casualty. If a judgment is secured against a railroad for damages, it could not properly charge that to capital.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not know to what it would charge it, but——

Mr. HOWELL. It would be a part of the cost of operation and maintenance of the road. This appropriation makes a distinction between capital expenditures and expenditures for operation and maintenance. I say that we ought not to incur any more capital expenditures upon the section of this railroad extending from Seward to Anchorage.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Not to take up the time of the Senate or of the Senator, I will put it in this way: Suppose that a bridge breaks down or an engine runs off the track and it is utterly destroyed and there is necessity to build a new bridge or to buy and install a new engine, who is to determine whether that is an expense to be chargeable to capital account or to maintenance of the road?

Mr. HOWELL. It is determined by the accounting department of the railroad. Suppose there is a bridge which is just completed and it is destroyed as the result of the derailment of a train. Of course, the replacement, if identical in character, would be charged to operation and maintenance.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Then what is it to which the Senator objects?

Mr. HOWELL. What I object to is that any more money shall go into the capital expenditures upon that section of the railroad extending from Seward to Anchorage.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. What could be done, then?

Mr. HOWELL. They would take the money out of the allowances for operation and maintenance.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. What would they do with it?

Mr. HOWELL. They would do whatever they wanted to with it upon that section of the road.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Suppose they want to build a bridge or install an engine?

Mr. HOWELL. If a new bridge were burned, or if new timbers were put into a bridge partially burned, such replacements would be maintenance and not chargeable to capital. If, however, a bridge were destroyed and replaced by a better bridge, part of the cost would be maintenance and part chargeable to capital.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HOWELL. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. For instance, if a depot were burned down, that would be charged to capital; if the road should buy engines, that would be charged to capital; if the road should buy freight cars, that would be charged to capital; if there were any destruction of such property and the property were replaced or they desired to increase the facilities because of the increase of business, any expenditure of that kind would be chargeable to capital. It would not be maintenance at all.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But the Senator from Nebraska does not want any of those things done, as I understand him.

Mr. HOWELL. The Senator from Utah is talking about rolling stock. He says if a new engine is purchased that that is chargeable to capital.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it not?

Mr. HOWELL. If it were a replacement they would take part out of the reserve for depreciation and the other portion out of capital. If it were a new additional engine it would all be chargeable to capital. That is the recognized practice in accounting.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no depreciation account kept in the case of the Alaska Railroad, because they never made a dollar, and will never make a dollar; that is all there is to it; so that they can not make any charges for depreciation.

Mr. HOWELL. Does the Senator from Utah suggest because this property makes no money that there is no depreciation and hence not even a paper reserve should be set up therefor?

Mr. SMOOT. The Alaska Railroad has not been able to set up any reserve against depreciation; it does not make enough now to pay operating expenses; and how is it going to set up any reserve unless the Congress of the United States appropriates the money?

Mr. HOWELL. I suggested a while ago that the $400,000 which they said they wanted to use for capital expenditures was, as a matter of fact, for deferred maintenance. That suggestion was contested. It was urged, "No; they want it for capital." If you admit there is and has been no provision for depreciation, then, this $1,300,000, for which they are asking, is the estimated deficit for this year; yet all the time the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] insists the deficit is only $900,000 and the $400,000 is for capital.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not know what the Senator from Ohio said, but I say that the $900,000 is required to make up the operating expenses of the railroad, and it is to cover all items under that head of every description. It does not take into account the $400,000. That is for capital, and that is what the appropriation is for.

Mr. COUZENS and Mr. SHORTRIDGE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HOWELL. I will yield in a moment. There is a marked distinction between capital investment and that which is taken from income on account of maintenance, or deferred maintenance or depreciation, whichever it may be called.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly, I agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from California was trying to find out for what the railroad would spend this $400,000 if it were allowed. I should like to ask the Senator what he thinks it would be spent for if it were allowed?

Mr. HOWELL. I think the railroad would spend a certain portion of it on new bridges between Anchorage and Seward.

Mr. COUZENS. And it is the Senator's opinion that the bridges do not need to be renewed?

Mr. HOWELL. I do not think they ought to be renewed at this time with new steel bridges chargeable, or a portion thereof chargeable, to capital.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator thinks that the whole $400,000 would be spent strictly for purposes that ought not to be provided for at this time? Is that his idea?

Mr. HOWELL. Not the whole $400,000, but there is a portion of that amount that is to go toward bridges. What my amendment provides is that no portion of the $400,000 shall be expended for capital account on that section of the road extending south of Anchorage.

Mr. COUZENS. Assuming that they have no depreciation reserve for that particular section, and a bridge should go out, how would the road replace it if it did not replace it from capital?

Mr. HOWELL. They would come back here next year and ask for an appropriation to cover a deficit.

Mr. COUZENS. And in the meantime the road would not be operated?

Mr. HOWELL. Oh, no; the road has gone right on heretofore under such circumstances. For instance, at times the deficit has been $1,600,000, and Congress has only appropriated $1,200,000. That would probably be the case for the coming year if there should be some casualty of the kind to which the Senator refers. However, what I am proposing now is that no portion of this amount shall be used for capital expenditures should the railroad management conclude it would like to build a new steel bridge to replace some wooden one.

Mr. COUZENS. I am sorry I do not get the Senator's point, because if a railway bridge needed replacing I do not see why it should not be replaced and why they should have to wait a year to come back to Congress to get a deficiency appropriation.

Mr. HOWELL. If it were a casualty, they could take a large portion of the cost from their maintenance fund; but if it were not a casualty, and they merely concluded to build a bridge because it is their policy to replace wooden bridges with steel bridges as fast as they could get the necessary money from Congress, that is the sort of capital expenditure to which I am opposed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is not a word here in relation to casualties. There would be no law for it, and the appropriation of $400,000 is for one of the purposes to which the Senator from Michigan has directed attention. Nothing could be done. If a bridge went out, that would settle it. If an engine went down, that would settle it. They could not buy one or operate the railroad.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, if that is true, why does not the bill state that this is not necessarily for capital expenditures; that it is for maintenance and deferred maintenance? If they are allowed $1,300,000, as provided in this bill, and it is stated to be for operation and maintenance, and they use a part of it for capital expenditures, there would not be any objection to their charging it to capital in the end.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, certainly there would. They have no right or authority to do it, and that is why the amendment is in the bill. It is to give them the authority; and now the Senator wants to strike it out.

Mr. HOWELL. Suppose a bridge goes down, and I take money out of my maintenance fund and repair that bridge, or build a new one. When I send a report to my accounting office, under our rules for accounting they would say, "So much is chargeable to maintenance and so much is chargeable to capital," as the case might be.

Mr. SMOOT. It would be quite a different thing if the Senator were running the road. That, perhaps, would be all right; but the Government is running this road, and the law limits the power of those who operate the railroad to expend money appropriated for that purpose and for no other. Any officer who would take maintenance money and expend it for capital purposes would be violating the law; and if an investigation were made, and that fact were disclosed, he would be most severely condemned.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, that is a remarkable statement of the distinguished Senator from Utah. In 1925 we appropriated $1,302,000 on account of a deficit, just as we are making an appropriation now, and they expended $1,674,000. Were they brought to task?

Mr. SMOOT. That was a deficiency. It was all for the one purpose; but they never took money out of one appropriation and used it for another purpose. Deficiencies are very common. We have two or three bills here every year to make up deficiencies.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. They are against the law.

Mr. SMOOT. I know they are against the law. I will admit that there is a law against incurring a deficiency or expending money in the way of deficiencies, but there is not a department of the Government but that does it. That is quite a different thing.

Mr. HOWELL. But the Senator is suggesting here that if they spent any money out of a reserve for depreciation, or if they took money out of a fund voted for maintenance and used it for capital, something terrible would happen to these officials; and yet the Senator admits that they are violating the law right along.

Mr. SMOOT. They have no right whatever to do it, and I do not think any Government official that I know of has ever done it; but I do know that time after time, every year, there are deficiencies incurred in the item for which the appropriation was made where it failed to cover the necessary cost. That is done every fiscal year, and I was going to say that in some departments or some bureaus of the Government perhaps it is done every single month in the year; but that is quite a different proposition.

Mr. COUZENS. In many cases the deficiencies are anticipated and not really made.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is true, too.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, suppose the management of this railroad is allowed $400,000 for capital expenditures and a casualty occurs and they use part of this $400,000 for maintenance?

Mr. SMOOT. They would not use it for that purpose. They have no right whatever to use it for that purpose. What they would do, if they did anything, would be to make a deficit in that fund of $900,000. That is what they would do. They would never take the money out of an appropriation for capital purposes and use it for any other purpose. They dare not do it; and not only that, but the Comptroller General never would allow the check to be paid.

Mr. HOWELL. Then I call the attention of the distinguished Senator from Michigan to the fact that there is no danger, such as he has suggested, in adopting my amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, there is.

Mr. HOWELL. If anything should occur in connection with a bridge, and there was not any money for capital expenditures, there would be no danger; there would simply result a deficit, and the Senator from Utah admits it.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; there would be no appropriation at all.

Mr. COUZENS. Let me submit this proposition: I think the Senators are talking at cross-purposes.

Assume that an inspector goes over the railroad and sees a dangerous bridge that needs replacing, and it is not worth while repairing it, and he has no funds for capital expenditures, and therefore he has to let the bridge go by, and risk the people's lives and property, because he has no money to spend for capital expenditures.

Mr. SMOOT. None whatever.

Mr. COUZENS. I think every institution ought to have in reserve some method of obtaining capital for cases of that kind, because if you replaced the whole bridge that could not be construed as mere maintenance. That would be capital account.

Mr. SMOOT. Not only that, but the Congress of the United States not entering upon that field and making no appropriation whatever for it, no officer of the Government would ever undertake to take the money from another fund; but if Congress had appropriated only $100,000, then they would only be following out the plan that is so often followed out by the departments. If it cost $125,000, they would spend $100,000 in order to do it, if it was absolutely necessary, and come to the Congress for a deficiency appropriation of $25,000; and the first deficiency appropriation bill that was passed would carry the $25,000.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, it must be very evident that if the superintendent of the road discovered that a bridge needed attention, there are two things he could do: He could either repair it or replace it. If he repaired it, it could not be urged that the repairs were chargeable to capital.

Mr. COUZENS. That is correct.

Mr. HOWELL. Therefore, I point out that if this amendment is adopted there will be no danger but that the road will be protected, unless they are coming to Congress and asking for money for capital expenditures when they really mean to use it for maintenance.

As I have stated before, Mr. President, I have no motive other than the welfare of Alaska, of this railroad, and of the Government of the United States. I regret there is not more sympathy for an effort to plug some of these holes that are constantly leaking. This thing has been going on for years. This is not the first time I have talked about it—possibly the first on the floor of the Senate—but I have discussed it with the responsible officials and I have discussed it with Senators. This is something that is crying for adjustment. We ought to treat it as a business proposition. We ought not to allow it to go on year after year without palliative attention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL].

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

THE MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I ask that there be printed in the RECORD an editorial from the San Francisco Chronicle of January 30, 1928, concerning the so-called Jones Shipping Board bill.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRESIDENT WILL HAVE TO VETO THE JONES SHIPPING BOARD BILL

The President can not do otherwise than veto the Jones bill if it passes. He has said just as clearly as possible where he stands on the policies in the bill. The people trying to force it through the Senate know that there is no other course than a veto open to Mr. Coolidge. They are not supporting it with any hope of seeing it put into effect, but are trying to accumulate a little political capital. They are whooping it up for a measure they know is doomed to be killed, so they do not have to worry whether it is good, bad, or indifferent.

The Jones bill would fasten the Shipping Board on the country with an even stronger grip than it has now. It would commit the Nation to tremendous further expenditures in the shipping business, which has already run us into such losses. It would start in all over again to create new fleets to be operated at staggering losses to the Government. And by requiring a unanimous vote by the board to approve the sale of any ships, it would make the Shipping Board a perpetual nuisance instead of, as now, an annoyance which we hope one day to be rid of.

President Coolidge has said that he is dismayed by the losses put upon the Treasury by the experiment in merchant marine. It was an experiment forced on the United States by the war, not as an encouragement of a merchant marine but as a war measure. But instead of demobilizing the fleets as it did the huge Army and sending the ships into private enterprise as the soldiers went back to industry and business the Government has kept on losing money in ships.

Putting the Shipping Board out of business will be a blow to the politicians who find a fertile field for their talents in its confused and often obscure operations. But it will be a good thing for the shipping business and the country generally when the Government gets out of what is essentially a private pursuit. The President has made it very clear that he regards the Shipping Board as a barnacle on the ship of state. It is a foregone conclusion that his only course is to swat it with a veto.

AGRICULTURE, HORTICULTURE, AND THE TARIFF

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I ask that there be printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Pacific Rural Press and California Farmer, dealing with agricultural and horticultural matters, as their prosperity may depend upon appropriate tariff legislation.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHEN BETTER BUCKS ARE PASSED

Tariffs are not political, they are economic, but try and convince a politician of that.

The other day the United States Senate adopted a resolution favoring the reduction of the tariff to help agriculture.

Inasmuch as tariff bills must originate in the House, this gesture by the Senate grades zero in economics, but doubtless the Senators considered that it rated high in politics.

"To help agriculture," the Senate said. What agriculture?

Not the lemon growers of this State, for they have found the present schedule of 2 cents per pound very helpful and would like a heavier duty on the Sicilian lemons which occasionally rock the market in this country.

Not the almond growers. They fought valiantly and violently to get a schedule of 4¾ cents per pounds on nuts in the shell and 14 cents a pound on shelled nuts. This tariff has been a life-saver to almond growers.

Not the western cherry growers, who recently induced the President to increase the tariff on brined cherries from Italy from 2 cents to 3 cents per pound, and who would like to have at least 7 cents a pound if the superior western cherry is to supply the maraschino trade on the basis of American standards of living.

Not the dairymen, who induced President Coolidge to increase the tariff on butter from 8 to 12 cents a pound, and who find the present tariff a valuable stabilizer.

Not walnuts, which now bear 4 cents a pound in the shell and 14 cents shelled, and which at these prices disclose the inferior, cheap walnut still coming in and being sold as "California" nuts. Branding and good selling has given us some protection, but a stiffer tariff would help one of our soundest American industries.

Not poultrymen. Imported eggs in the shell must now pay 8 cents a dozen, while poultrymen are actively asking 14 cents. Frozen eggs, which come in from China in large quantities, now bear a tariff of only 6 cents a pound; poultrymen ask 12 cents a pound for frozen whole eggs and 15 cents a pound on frozen yolks and albumen. The mummied eggs from China now freely pay a tariff of 18 cents a pound. Poultrymen want 28 cents a pound on dried whole eggs, 27 cents on dried yolks, and 56 cents a pound on dried albumen. Both producers and consumers have a right to demand an American egg in their cakes, noodles, mayonnaise, candy, etc.

Not wool. Try and take away from wool the schedule of 12 cents a pound in the grease, 18 cents washed, and 24 cents scoured and then prepare to run, for the wool industry is ready to fight for its tariff.

If the Senate wants to wreck an American industry, let it take away from the beet-sugar industry the meager protection which has kept it alive.

Tomatoes, beans, rice; these crops need tariffs, if we care to foster home industry. A moderate tariff on bananas would encourage the entire fruit industry of this country. Cotton, soy beans, and butter would be helped by an adequate tariff on foreign vegetable oils. We surely ought to do something about a situation in which Brazil taxes our canned peaches up into the dollar-a-can class, meanwhile pouring her coffee into this country duty free.

The list might be lengthened, but this will indicate that the Senate took in a lot of territory when it advocated the decrease of the tariff to help agriculture.

As a wag has said, "When better bucks are passed the Senate will pass them."

PREFERENTIAL RIGHT TO IMMIGRATION

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 243, Senate Joint Resolution 5, which will, with its amended title, be a joint resolution to grant a preference to the wives and minor children of alien declarants in the issuance of immigration visas—preference within the quotas, Mr. President, not displacing the present preferences which are granted to agricultural laborers and to relatives of citizens.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I understand that the joint resolution which the Senator from Pennsylvania is seeking to call up for consideration has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is true, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And that it does not alter the quota now provided by law as to any nationality, but merely gives a preference right to wives and minor children of aliens under the quota.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is true.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CARAWAY and Mr. TRAMMELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. May I yield first to the Senator from Arkansas, who rose first?

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question. This measure permits the wives of citizens to come in?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The wives of citizens are now admitted outside the quota. This permits the wives of those who have taken out their first papers to come in within the quota, but with a preference over those who have no relatives.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I interrupted the Senator because I have a question in mind I desire to ask. I happen to know of the case of a man who came to this country, who was married in this country, who lives here, and who is a good citizen, but it transpires that he is not entitled to remain. His wife is American born. If this is to unite families, does it include husbands as well as wives?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. This resolution does not, but the present law gives the husband of that American wife a preference within the quota. The committee does not treat him as a nonquota immigrant, because the natural place for husbands and wives to join is the country of the husband, not her country, but if they decide they want to come to her country, the present law gives him a preference within the quota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HEFLIN. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I want to make a further inquiry.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. TRAMMELL. From the title of the bill, and from a hasty reading of it, I am impressed that this provides for additional immigration, that these people are placed in the nonquota class, and therefore an additional number of immigrants are to be admitted under the nonquota class. Am I correct or wrong in that?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I think I have the floor, Mr. President. The Senator is correct in understanding that the joint resolution as introduced would have that effect; but the commitee has amended it to make them quota immigrants, so that it would not increase the sum total of immigration by a single person.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I was misled, then, by the title of the joint resolution as it was originally introduced.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. We have provided an amendment to the title which will correct that.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The amendment takes care of that?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection having been made——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I want to make my appeal to the Senator from Alabama to permit us to consider the joint resolution. The committee is firmly of the opinion that the policy of restrictive immigration must not be weakened. I know the Senator from Alabama concurs in that. This merely tends to take account of the feelings of those families that are separated, where the husband has declared his intention of becoming an American citizen, and allows these relatives to come in within the quotas. It would not increase the total immigration by a single person, but would merely permit them to come instead of people of the same nationality who have no relatives here.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. As I understand it, this relates to a case where the husband is already in this country?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Absolutely.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Unless some legislation like this is enacted, there will continue to be many cases where the husband has declared his intention to become an American citizen and where the wife and minor children are in foreign countries and can not come to the husband. This will not add to the number of immigrants in any number. It will give a preferential right to wives and minor children where the husband is already in the country. I think the legislation is meritorious.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama permit me to add my request to that of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

I want to make plain that in this instance a preferential right is given the nonresident wife. There is no addition to the immigration, no addition to the quota. It simply covers a case where a man has come to this country, has declared his intention to become a citizen, his wife resides in another country, and she is given a preferential right merely on the long quota list. That is all there is to it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, in view of the explanation and my understanding of it, I am not going to insist on my objection; but I am going to fight any measure looking to unrestricted immigration, any inroads made upon the present law on that subject. There are now being smuggled into New York and other points in the United States perhaps a million foreigners a year. Mr. Brisbane, in an article published sometime last year, said that perhaps a million people were being smuggled into the United States. It is a very dangerous situation which confronts us.

I can see in this particular instance that it would work an injustice upon these families to keep the members separated, the husband here and the wife and children in a foreign country. I want to point this out to Senators, that it will be very easy for those people to send somebody over here and let him take out papers, and then bring a flock of 8 or 10 more with him. I want Congress to be on guard, to see to it that other countries do not make a dumping ground out of the United States for their criminal refuse.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. BLEASE. I just want to ask the Senator from Alabama this question: Did not the men sought to be covered by this measure know when they came here that they could not bring their families?

Mr. HEFLIN. Perhaps they did.

Mr. BLEASE. If the Senator withdraws his objection, I certainly will renew it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I can answer the Senator's question. This takes care of a great throng of people who came here before the law was passed and did not know that the law would prevent their bringing their families.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, if the Senator will let me interrupt him, we have before a subcommittee of the Committee on Immigration right now a bill for the Chinese, and a delegation of Chinamen have appeared before that subcommittee asking for practically the same kind of relief that is asked here, probably just a little different. The first thing we know there will not be any American people in this country; they will all be mixed breeds.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will not the Senator permit me to answer that? In the first place, as far as the Chinamen go, this would do them no good, because both the husband and the wife must be eligible to citizenship. This would not let in a single Chinaman, a single Malay, a single person from the barred zone. In the next place, if we believe in restricting immigration—and I think the Senator from South Carolina believes in it, just as I do, and the Senator from Alabama believes in, as I do—this would have the effect of diminishing slightly the total number of persons coming to this country each year, and this is how it will accomplish that: Under the joint resolution which I am now asking the Senate to consider the wives and children of intending citizens would be permitted to join them now. If they came under this plan, they would be charged against the quota. If we do not pass this, they will have to wait three years more, until the final papers are taken out, and then, if you please, they can come, but they come as wives and children of American citizens, outside the quota, and the full quota number come besides. So by letting them come now we charge them against the quota. By making them wait we get them in outside the quota. The net result would be an increase of immigration.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In practical effect, then, this would further restrict immigration.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Practically, it would further restrict immigration.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. MAYFIELD. With the permission of the Senator from Alabama, I want to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if this proposed legislation would not apply only to those who came to this country prior to the enactment of the present immigration law?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, it would apply to those who declared their intention to become citizens prior to the 1st of last July. It would not apply to anyone who might come in the future. The resolution itself provides that it is only in effect one year, that it benefits only people who have come in the past and who declared their intention to become citizens more than seven months ago.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield further?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. Even under this measure, would the wives and children of those who have taken out their papers intending to become citizens in excess of the quota be restricted? I mean, if the quota of any nationality were full, would this operate to allow the wives and children of those intending to become citizens to come in?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No; they would have to wait until some year when they could get into the quota.

Mr. SMITH. I understood the Senator to say that it would be charged up to the quota, and I thought perhaps it would anticipate and be charged up against it, so that in future years the number would be subtracted from that quota.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Oh, no; they are charged up against the quota the year they come.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. This would not apply, then, to any races not now eligible to American citizenship?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Absolutely not.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. To the oriental?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. This would not allow a single one to come in, even if she were married to an American citizen.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to ask the Senator a question, and I desire the attention of the Senator from South Carolina. I understand, from the Senator's explanation, that if this joint resolution shall pass, the wives of men who are already here from foreign lands will be given preference coming over, instead of other immigrants?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is exactly the case.

Mr. HEFLIN. Until the quota is filled?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is it.

Mr. HEFLIN. And if the joint resolution is not passed, those wives will remain over there, perhaps, and others will come in their places, so that we will have the same number coming that we would have if enough of these women did not come to fill up the quota?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is exactly it.

Mr. HEFLIN. With that understanding, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Immigration, with all due respect, of course, to my friend from Pennsylvania, if that is his idea as to the purpose of this measure.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, Mr. President, if I may be permitted to say so. As the joint resolution originally came to us, it was quite different, but as amended by the committee, it merely gives a preferential right in the existing quota, not increasing the quota at all. We did not increase the quota.

Assume that over here is the husband of a woman in France. We will assume that he has taken out his first papers. France, we will say, has 1,000 people who are entitled under the quota to come here. The wife of this individual who has taken out his first papers, who lives in France, becomes one of the 1,000. We do not increase the 1,000 to 1,001. She takes somebody else's place who would come if she did not get the right, so, as has been well said by the Senator from Pennsylvania, it is restrictive rather than an increase in the number of immigrants.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, we have been fooled so many times on this immigration proposition that I want my position to be perfectly plain. I am opposed to this immigration. If I had my way, there are a lot of foreigners in this country whom I would put on a boat in 30 days and send out of the country, and I would keep the balance out. I would make this country an American country, and I would keep it American. We have a lot of these people coming here who, on account of the cheap manner in which they can exist, and the way they do exist, are depriving American citizens of positions that belong to them, and making vagrants and criminals out of people by overloading and staying around the cities and becoming criminals instead of going to places where they can get work.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama has withdrawn his objection. Therefore, the Chair asks whether there is objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I believe in restricted immigration, and I want to guard jealously against opening up any further avenues to immigration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator object to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do, until I may have an opportunity to make an inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Under the section of the law which this measure seeks to amend, section 2–A, paragraph 1, it is provided that the preference shall first be given to a quota immigrant who is the unmarried child under 21 years of age, the father, the mother, the husband, or the wife of a citizen of the United States who is 21 years of age or over.

If I correctly construe the resolution which we are asked to consider, it gives to an alien in this country who has declared his intention to apply for citizenship a preference to bring in members of his family over a person who is already a citizen of the United States. If that is the purpose of it—and I can place no other construction upon the bill or the law as I read them—then we are certainly discriminating in favor of the alien who has merely declared his intention to become a citizen as against the person who is already a citizen of the United States. He is placed in a preferential class. He is given first preference over all the other classes under the Senator's joint resolution.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, the Senator's misunderstanding of that is natural. It comes about in this way: If the Senator will look in the preceding section of the act, he will see that the wives and children of American citizens who live in this country are admitted as nonquota immigrants. They are not within the quota at all. Then when we come to section 6, the section from which the Senator has been reading, the preference there given is within the quota to the wives and children and other relatives of American citizens, but it does not provide that the husband has to be living here. That is a provision which inures practically exclusively to the benefit of Americans who are not residents of the United States, and was intended to take care of Americans who go abroad and get married and who are not bona fide residents of the United States. In other words, we do not want a man merely to assert an American citizenship if in fact he is a resident of some other country, and then use it as an excuse to get a lot of people in here outside the quota.

The effect of the joint resolution will be to add this new preference in the same class as the preference which is given to those nonresident Americans. It does not make the new preference superior to them. It gives them a preference similar to that which an American, who had given up his residence in the United States and is living, we will say, in France and gets married over there, might have if he decided that he and his wife would come to the United States to take up a new residence. The committee thought that it was fair to do that, because surely a person living here, lawfully entered, who has declared his intention of becoming a citizen, has as much right to get his wife in here as some expatriated American who is living abroad.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield to me that I may ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. Did the committee consider what might happen if the declarant, after declaring and getting his wife and minor children over here, should stop right there and not take any other steps? Does not the Senator think it would be very unwise for a situation of that kind to exist, for a declarant to go so far as to declare, get his wife and minor children in, and then stop and not proceed further toward citizenship?

I can see that there is some merit in the contention of the Senator or of the committee about the wife and minor children, but does not the Senator think we ought to take one step further and provide that the citizenship papers must be completed? We ought not to have families of aliens brought over and still have the heads of those families remain aliens.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is largely a question of the practicability of doing it. We believe it is better, as long as they are being charged to the quota anyway, that we get the relatives of people here who have started to become citizens rather than to bring in strangers who are not related to anybody. It has the effect of making a stable family.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And who might never become citizens?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Absolutely.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No man who comes in under the quota is obligated even to take out his first papers.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. They are a little more likely to become citizens and good citizens if they have their families than if they are here alone, with the family in the other country.

Let me give the Senator one more picture. I had a case brought to my attention yesterday of a Scotchman who came here two years ago, leaving his wife and three little children back in Scotland. He came out to western Pennsylvania and got himself a job in one of the mills there. The superintendent told me about the case. Ordinarily, he said, in the old days when an applicant came along for a job and got it, his next question through an interpreter was, "Where can I find a boarding house?" This man spoke English, described his experience, got the position, and his very first question to the employment agency was, "Is there a Protestant church in the neighborhood?" They told him where he could find it, and his next question was, "Where can I rent a house for myself? I do not want to live in a boarding house." They told him that, and he got his little house and settled down in it.

As soon as possible he took out his first papers, and yesterday appealed to me, this same man I had been told about before, to know when he was going to be able to get his wife and his children here from Scotland. He has already bought his house and largely paid for it; that is, it is more than half paid for. If we do not let that man's wife and children in, he is going to keep on doing just what he has been doing since he got that job, sending money to them every week out of the United States to be spent in Scotland, and living here like a lonely bachelor. If we let them come in, they are charged against the British quota. By their coming they exclude two other strangers from coming.

They come right to their own house which the husband has established, and the money he has been sending to Scotland ceases to go there and is spent in the United States, where it ought to be spent. We have not increased the immigration by one iota. If we do not let them come he will go on until he gets his final papers and then he will bring them in as nonquota, and we will have just that many more people added to the immigration.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, does the Senator from Pennsylvania happen to know that we have a great many immigrants in this country who stay here to make all the money they think it is possible for them to make and then will leave and go back to their old country?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do know of such cases, and that is what I want to end.

Mr. BLEASE. If the Senator will stop that I shall go all the way with him.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. We had much better keep the money here.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The question I raised, of course, was on account of section 9. Having looked up the subject very hurriedly I did not realize that the law under this section also puts the same class under the nonquota.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Providing the husband lives in America.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The existing law puts them under the nonquota class and also gives them a preference under the quota class. Of course, with those two provisions, construing the entire law together, those who are members of the family of an American citizen come in as a nonquota class. Therefore there is no conflict, as I see it, in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania with the existing law.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator is exactly right.

Mr. TRAMMELL. My idea was that if there was a conflict we should not give preference to the alien who had only declared his intention to become a citizen over the American citizen in the matter of bringing in members of his family.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I think we are agreed on that point.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I am heartily in sympathy with the idea that if we are going to allow immigrants to come to this country we should give a preference to the members of the family under those circumstances, provided they are charged up against the quota. In other words, it is not that I am opposed to having members of a family brought in, because I think that is a very just and humane thing to do, but what I object to is any provision or amendment which will extend or enlarge the quota. I do not see that there is any reason why I should object to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have no objection to the unanimous-consent request inasmuch as a number of Senators who desire to speak on the unfinished business, Senate Resolution 128, have said that they desire to speak to-morrow rather than to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Immigration with amendments.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania? Will the Senator turn to the first page, line 6, after the numerals "1924"? Would he object to the insertion of the words at that point, "and who declare they will complete their citizenship"?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is what the declarants say in their first papers. This would be calling on them to state a second time what they have already stated in their first papers.

Mr. McKELLAR. In making their first application they state that?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. There ought to be a requirement in this measure unquestionably that they should complete their citizenship papers. How it could be done I do not know. Certainly we ought not to offer a premium to a man to bring his family here and thereafter have him neglect his citizenship.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I agree with the Senator.

The amendments of the Committee on Immigration were, on page 1, line 7, after the word "grant," to strike out "nonquota" and insert "a preference in the issuance of"; in line 9, after the word "aliens," to insert "in the same manner as if such aliens were specifically described in section 6 (a) (1) of the said act"; in line 11, after the word "wife," to strike out "or husband"; on page 2, line 2, before the word "intention," to strike out "or her"; on page 2, line 4, after the date "July 1," to strike out "1924" and insert "1927"; in the same line, after the word "citizenship," to insert "provided that such wife and such alien were married prior to the enactment of this joint resolution"; in line 8, before the word "intention," to strike out "or her"; in line 11, after the date "July 1," to strike out "1924" and insert "1927," and in line 12, before the word "immigration," to strike out "nonquota," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That on and after the passage of this joint resolution, on application by declarants in the manner provided for the making of application by citizens for the admission of relatives in the immigration act of 1924, American consuls are hereby authorized and directed to grant a preference in the issuance of immigration visas to the following classes of otherwise admissible aliens in the same manner as if such aliens were specifically described in section 6 (a) (1) of the said act: (1) The wife of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence in the United States who declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States subsequent to July 1, 1921, and prior to July 1, 1927, and who is eligible for citizenship, provided that such wife and such alien were married prior to the enactment of this joint resolution, (2) an unmarried child under 18 years of age of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence in the United States who declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States subsequent to July 1, 1921, and prior to July 1, 1927, and who is eligible for citizenship. Applications for such immigration visas by reason of this relationship must be made within one year after the passage of this resolution.

The Secretary of State, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, shall issue such rules and regulations as may be deemed necessary for carrying into effect the purpose of this resolution under the general provisions of the immigration act of 1924.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "Joint resolution to grant a preference to the wives and minor children of alien declarants in the issuance of immigration visas."

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 9, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

ARBITRATION TREATY WITH FRANCE

On request of Mr. BORAH, and by unanimous consent, the injunction of secrecy was this day removed from the following treaty of arbitration between the United States and the French Republic:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 6, 1928.

To the Senate:

To the end that I may receive the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith an arbitration treaty between the United States and the French Republic, signed at Washington on February 6, 1928.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Acting Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate, to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, an arbitration treaty between the United States and the French Republic, signed at Washington on February 6, 1928.

ROBERT E. OLDS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 6, 1928.

The President of the United States of America and the President of the French Republic

Determined to prevent so far as in their power lies any interruption in the peaceful relations that have happily existed between the two nations for more than a century;

Desirous of reaffirming their adherence to the policy of submitting to impartial decision all justiciable controversies that may arise between them;

Eager by their example not only to demonstrate their condemnation of war as an instrument of national policy in their mutual relations, but also to hasten the time when the perfection of international arrangements for the pacific settlement of international disputes shall have eliminated forever the possibility of war among any of the Powers of the world;

Having in mind the treaty signed at Washington on September 15, 1914, to facilitate the settlement of disputes between the United States of America and France;

Have decided to conclude a new treaty of arbitration enlarging the scope of the arbitration convention signed at Washington on February 10, 1908, which expires by limitation on February 27, 1928, and promoting the cause of arbitration and for that purpose they have appointed as their respective Plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America:

Mr. Robert E. Olds, Acting Secretary of State, and

The President of the French Republic:

His Excellency Mr. Paul Claudel, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the French Republic to the United States, who, having communicated to one another their full powers found in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I

Any disputes arising between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the French Republic of whatever nature they may be, shall, when ordinary diplomatic proceedings have failed and the High Contracting Parties do not have recourse to adjudication by a competent tribunal, be submitted for investigation and report, as prescribed in the treaty signed at Washington, September 15, 1914, to the Permanent International Commission constituted pursuant thereto.

ARTICLE II

All differences relating to international matters in which the High Contracting Parties are concerned by virtue of a claim of right made by one against the other under treaty or otherwise, which it has not been possible to adjust by diplomacy, which have not been adjusted as a result of reference to the above-mentioned Permanent International Commission, and which are justiciable in the nature by reason of being susceptible of decision by the application of the principles of law or equity, shall be submitted to the Permanent Court of Arbitration established at The Hague by the Convention of October 18, 1907, or to some other competent tribunal, as shall be decided in each case by special agreement, which special agreement shall provide for the organization of such tribunal if necessary, define its powers, state the question or questions at issue, and settle the terms of reference.

The special agreement in each case shall be made on the part of the United States of America by the President of the United States of America by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and on the part of France in accordance with the constitutional laws of France.

ARTICLE III

The provisions of this treaty shall not be invoked in respect of any dispute the subject matter of which

(a) is within the domestic jurisdiction of either of the High Contracting Parties,

(b) involves the interests of third parties,

(c) depends upon or involves the maintenance of the traditional attitude of the United States concerning American questions, commonly described as the Monroe Doctrine,

(d) depends upon or involves the observance of the obligations of France in accordance with the covenant of the League of Nations.

ARTICLE IV

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof and by the President of the French Republic in accordance with the constitutional laws of the French Republic.

The ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible, and the treaty shall take effect on the date of the exchange of the ratifications. It shall thereafter remain in force continuously unless and until terminated by one year's written notice given by either High Contracting Party to the other.

In faith thereof the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty in duplicate in the English and French languages, both texts having equal force, and hereunto affix their seals.

Done at Washington the sixth day of February in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and twenty-eight.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, February 8, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, we thank Thee for Thy holy word. Light up the old texts that we used to know; illuminate the time-worn phrases that our mothers taught us in years gone by; reveal unto us their tardy applications and let go their deep spiritual meaning. Our mothers and fathers, they lived so simply; their ways were so toilsome. May their honest virtues pass on into our lives. Our country, so dear to all hearts! Our free institutions, so wonderful in their blessings! If we fail to remember these, let our tongues cling to the roofs of our mouths. Let service, patriotic service, become sweeter in our hearts and braver in our lives. O God, persuade us that the man who day by day cherishes a sweet, uplifting love is the grandest specimen that can be produced. In the holy name of Jesus, our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ADDRESS OF WILLIAM D. GUTHRIE, OF NEW YORK

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a memorable and noble address delivered by William D. Guthrie, the president of the Bar Association of the City of New York and of the France-America Society, at a banquet tendered to the French ambassador, Paul Claudel, in the city of New York by the France-America Society on Monday last, February 6, the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the signing of the treaty of alliance and friendship between France and the United States, negotiated by Benjamin Franklin with the French Government, and signed on February 6, 1778, which brought France into the Revolution upon our side and contributed so materially to the glorious result. On Monday last also, it is interesting to note, the treaty to remove the possibility of war between the United States and France was with singular appropriateness signed by the French ambassador and our Secretary of State here in Washington.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is this address a veiled support of the plan for practical cancellation of the French war debt due our Government?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. O Mr. Speaker, there is no mention and no suggestion of any such thing in this address which simply deals with this very moving anniversary.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I accept the statement of the gentleman from New York, but I am receiving a great many of those veiled arguments in support of the cancellation of the French debt.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I can assure the gentleman there is no such suggestion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF SIGNING OF TREATY OF ALLIANCE AND FRIENDSHIP BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND FRANCE, FEBRUARY 6, 1778

No event in American history is worthier to be celebrated and none has been bigger with great and enduring consequences than the signing at Paris on February 6, 150 years ago, of the treaty of amity and commerce and the treaty of alliance between the King of France and the United States of North America, as we were then named. It was a mighty fact in the annals of France and of America; and from it flowed the most far-reaching human movements and developments that have occurred since the downfall of the Roman Empire.

The treaty of amity and commerce was the first one signed. Briefly stated, it recognized the United States as an independent Nation, and stipulated that there should be a true and sincere friendship between the two countries, that the United States should at all times have the most favored nation privileges throughout France and in French ports, and that its terms should be perpetual. The execution of the treaty of alliance immediately followed. It declared, as expressed in the English version: "The essential and direct end of the present defensive alliance is to maintain effectually the liberty, sovereignty, and independence absolute and unlimited, of the said United States, as well in matters of government as of commerce"; and the King of France unqualifiedly guaranteed their liberty, sovereignty, and independence. Although the treaties were intended to be lasting, they were nevertheless abrogated by our Congress in July, 1798.

These treaties were unexampled in the generosity and disinterestedness manifested on the part of France toward a new nation, without resources and without adequate armament, bravely, and desperately battling for liberty and independence against a great European power. It was no wonder that their generous terms were characterized by European statesmen as "a glaring instance of quixotism," to quote the language of the then Prime Minister of Spain, and that they were regarded by many as an improvident sacrifice of the permanent material interests of France. Indeed, as it turned out, the performance of the obligations assumed by France called for financial sacrifices that brought about the bankruptcy of the French Crown and in great measure precipitated the French revolution of 1789.

It is a pity that the terms of these treaties and the sacrifices made for us by France in their performance, never requited until our day, are not more generally taught in our schools and colleges in order to have our people realize the extent of our debt to France and to quicken in them that finest of human virtues—the sense of gratitude.

As soon as Washington heard the news of the signing of the treaties—and it took nearly three months before it reached him at Valley Forge—he wrote to the President of Congress congratulating him on the good tidings, and expressing his belief that "no event was ever received with a more heartfelt joy." Encouraging and heartening must it have been to him and his Army after a winter of hunger and cold and dreadful suffering, of unparalleled misery, of perilous crisis, so great that Valley Forge has called forth the pity and admiration of historians and has led the English writer, Trevelyan, to declare that "as time goes on it bids fair to be the most celebrated encampment in the world's history."

Congress on May 4, 1778, ratified the treaties and sent to the King of France its grateful acknowledgment of his generosity and disinterestedness and its wish that the friendship between the two nations thus so happily commenced might be perpetual. Two days later, on May 6, Washington issued a general order to the American Army in which he reverently declared—I am quoting his own language: "It having pleased the Almighty Ruler of the Universe to defend the cause of the United American States, and finally to raise us up a powerful friend among the princes of the earth, to establish our liberty and independency upon a lasting foundation; it becomes us to set apart a day for gratefully acknowledging the divine goodness, and celebrating the event which we owe to His divine interposition." Washington directed the several brigades to assemble the next morning, when their chaplains were to communicate the intelligence, offer up thanksgiving to God, and deliver discourses suitable to the occasion. He further directed that the religious services should be followed by a military review, and that thereupon the whole Army should huzza, "Long live the King of France!"

We have not time to-night to recall in any detail how loyally, generously, and effectively the Government of the King of France kept the pledges he made in these treaties and without compensation or indemnity of any nature. To those who have studied the history of the War of Independence and reflected upon the paucity of the American forces and equipment, the despondency at Valley Forge in February, 1778, and the danger of dissolution of our Army at the very time when these treaties of relief were being negotiated and concluded in Paris, as well as the decisive effect of the French aid during the following three years and a half, the conclusion must be irresistible that the American cause could not possibly have triumphed at Yorktown had it not been for the supplies and funds furnished by France and the cooperation of the French army and the French fleet. On the morning after the surrender of Cornwallis, Washington pledged to the Count de Rochambeau and through him to France "the most unalterable gratitude" of our country; and this celebration to-night bears testimony that that pledge has not been forgotten and that it will be kept a living force among those Americans who remember. Six months after Yorktown, in April, 1782, Washington wrote to the Chevalier de la Luzerne that the continued aid of the King of France was "among a variety of important considerations, which ought to bind Americans and French in bonds of indelible friendship and gratitude, never, I hope, to be sundered."

The societies initiating this celebration have felt that the message from the long past would not be adequately conveyed if we did not in some way emphasize and attempt to picture in our minds the misery and suffering of the American Army under Washington and Lafayette at Valley Forge. The apprehension and discouragement felt even by Washington should be recalled in order to engrave on our hearts how desperate our fortunes were in February, 1778, and how much we then and subsequently owed to France. In looking over mementos of that winter, a winter that so awfully tried the souls of the American officers and soldiers in this historic encampment, we have found nothing that seemed to us quite so characteristic of Washington during this period of trial and hardship as the bronze bas-relief in front of the subtreasury building on Wall Street, which represents him kneeling in prayer in the snow at Valley Forge, and we have reproduced it for those who may treasure such a heart-stirring souvenir of the darkest hour in our history. It may be an inspiration to believe, as Washington himself devoutly believed, that his prayers were heard and answered.

If the immortal souls of Washington and Lafayette are conscious of this celebration, immense must be their gratification to realize that their sacrifices and services in the common cause of American liberty and independence are still bearing fruit in the hearts of Americans and French. Their spirits still live. The souls of the truly great survive in the continuing effects of their lives and works. Who will challenge our faith that the sacrifices and services of these two noble men have continued to inspire Americans to patriotic service and sacrifice from generation to generation? Who can doubt that during the World War millions of Americans were stirred, consciously or unconsciously, by the peerless spirit and example of these two Americans? For Lafayette was an American. He was called the man of two worlds. With prophetic vision he wrote to his wife during his first voyage to America on board La Victoire, June 7, 1777: "I hope that, for my sake, you will become a good American, for that feeling is worthy of every noble heart. The happiness of America is intimately connected with the happiness of all mankind." America was Lafayette's adopted country, and he was the adopted son of Washington. Hence, we love him and cherish his memory not only as a great Frenchman but as well a great American patriot and major general of the American Army of the Revolution.

Is it extravagant to believe that countless Americans are keeping alive in their hearts the spirit and influence of the souls of Washington and Lafayette, inseparable in their memory? How easy it would be for modern pagans, if there be any such among us, to deify these two Americans as the Greeks and Romans deified their heroes. Yet we may conceive them as in the Valhalla of the illustrious, and we may well pray to them for present and future inspiration in our hopes, struggles, and aspirations and in our desire to be worthy of fellowship with their spirits.

Your excellency, it is surely a happy and poetic augury for the future relations between our two countries that on this sesquicentennial anniversary of the conclusion of these famous treaties, and amid and notwithstanding vastly changed conditions, descendants of the associates and compatriots of Washington and Lafayette and inheritors of the fruits of one of the most important and decisive events in the world's history should not have forgotten the great service then generously rendered to America by France, and should be proclaiming to-day, alike in France and in America, the survival of American gratitude to France, the perseverance of French friendship for America, and the mutual hope that these sentiments and ties, so stirring and inspiring, shall ever be maintained among the traditions and ideals of both nations.

JOINT RESOLUTION OF THE VIRGINIA GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a very brief resolution passed by the General Assembly of Virginia relative to matters of public interest, this resolution being addressed to the Virginia delegation in Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following: A joint resolution of the General Assembly of Virginia, protesting against certain freight-rate adjustments, which are discriminatory against and hurtful to interests in that State.

RESOLUTION

Whereas the Constitution of the United States not only does not confer upon Congress the authority to impose tariff and other import duties upon commerce between the States but affirmatively asserts the principle of free and untrammeled commerce between the States; and

Whereas the Interstate Commerce Commission, in recent decisions and opinions, has construed the transportation act and the interstate commerce act to confer upon it the authority not to regulate the conduct of interstate commerce, but to control it to the extent of excluding the commerce of certain States from competitive markets outside their borders and of giving a monopoly of trade in those markets to competitors in other States; and

Whereas this construction of the statutes by the Interstate Commerce Commission will work inevitable and fatal injury to the interchange of all business between the States, and, therefore, to the general welfare of all the people, and said decisions and opinions have already proven injurious to the coal, agricultural, horticultural, manufacturing, and fishing industries of Virginia, by directly impairing its internal business in interstate commerce: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, by the house of delegates (the senate concurring), That the Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States from the State of Virginia be, and are hereby, requested to do everything in their power to effect such changes in the Federal statutes as will prevent a repetition of such decisions and to have said statutes so amended as to make the construction thereof aforesaid impossible.

Agreed to by house of delegates, February 3, 1928.

JNO. W. WILLIAMS,
Clerk House of Delegates.

Agreed to by the senate, February 3, 1928.

O. V. HAUGE,
Clerk of the Senate.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the following conferees: Messrs. MORIN, JAMES, and MCSWAIN.

THE BITUMINOUS COAL FIELDS

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, I have been given permission to address the House this afternoon for the purpose of placing before its Members and the country specific information relative to the deplorable conditions now prevailing throughout the bituminous coal fields of central and western Pennsylvania, Ohio, and certain sections of West Virginia.

You are no doubt aware that there is an industrial war, commonly called a strike, prevailing in the sections I have mentioned. Many of you, however, are not aware of the outrageous practices imposed upon the strikers, of the insults heaped upon womanhood, of the abuses imposed upon innocent children in western Pennsylvania. Such methods are unjustifiable, unwarranted, unnecessary, and should not, and must not be tolerated in this progressive age. And the soulless corporations responsible for them deserve and should receive the eternal condemnation of every just man and the rebuke of Congress of the United States.

WILKES-BARRE A BEAUTIFUL PLACE

For the information of the Members of the House who were not present on February 1, 1924, when I described the anthracite-coal situation, I desire to inform them that I am a resident of Wilkes-Barre, Pa. That beautiful and historic city, replete with traditional, historic, and patriotic events, famous in song and story, possessing brave men and angelic women, whose goodness and greatness are known everywhere, is situated in the heart of the anthracite coal regions.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] will assume the chair.

QUITE APPROPRIATE FOR A WOMAN TO PRESIDE

Mr. CASEY. Let me say that it is most fitting and appropriate for a woman to assume the Speaker's chair at this time, because I am going to talk about women, many of them mothers, whose love of home and devotion to duty can not be excelled, and I am going to talk also of children, many of them not more than babies, helpless, undernourished, half starved. She will understand the need of prompt action. Therefore it is quite appropriate for a woman to be in the Speaker's chair. [Applause.]

But before I describe the conditions as I personally viewed them, I desire to reiterate that I am the son of a miner; that I have worked as a breaker boy when only 8 years of age; and that I have followed the usual course a mine boy pursues, from the breaker to the mines.

IMPRINT OF THE TYRANNICAL HEEL

I have lived in the coal company shacks, such as will be described in detail at a later period in my address. I have suffered all the oppressions that it is possible for the iron heel of tyranny to impose upon its humble subjects in the mine patches of this country.

I have lived among miners all my life. And I know them as well as any man in the country. I have found them true to their homes, their country, and their God. They are outstanding citizens, with high-class, ambitious, and aspiring families. They have human hearts. They are true to every trust. They are actuated by high motives. They love peace, but they are not afraid to fight for principle and what they believe is right and just. And when the reports came to the miners of the anthracite region, my friends and my neighbors, through their union, that their fellow miners of the bituminous region were in trouble; that they were suffering as the anthracite workers suffered in the years just past, I promised them that I would investigate and if I found conditions as they described them I would appeal to Congress and the country.

THE DOLLAR PLACED BEFORE JUSTICE

The very next day I was on my way to western Pennsylvania and in that part of the State I spent one week. I visited the mine patches, entered honest though humble homes. I talked with the individual miner and with groups of them. And I interviewed impartial citizens, and after doing so I went to other mine patches and renewed my efforts to get the truth; the whole truth. And after concluding my investigations I stood appalled at the nature of the information I had unearthed; I viewed the scenes all about with intense indignation, and I concluded that I would do everything in my power to right the wrongs so flagrantly imposed by corporations who have put the dollar before justice and human life, and that I would place this information before Congress and appeal to its sense of justice.

I know that my appeal will not go unanswered; that you, my colleagues, will do your part in reestablishing order; that you will do your part in seeing that the happiness of those unhappy miners is restored; that you will do your part in alleviating the suffering and the distress of the suffering women and famished children.

EXPRESSING ONLY INDIVIDUAL VIEWS

But before I proceed further I again repeat the statement that I made while discussing the anthracite situation, to the effect that anything I may say this afternoon represents only my own personal views. I do not speak as a representative of either the operators or the miners' union, because I do not belong to either organization, but will endeavor to give you an impartial statement of facts as I found them.

THE CASEY RESOLUTION

In the first place, I want to say that some time ago I introduced a resolution in the House which is known as House Resolution 109, a similar resolution having been introduced in the Senate by Senator JOHNSON, of California. This resolution provides for an investigation into the terrible situation in western Pennsylvania, and has been referred to the Committee on Rules of the House.

Resolved, That the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed immediately to make a thorough and complete investigation of the conditions existing in the coal fields of central Pennsylvania, western Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Ohio; also to ascertain whether the railroad companies and their officials have been or are, by agreement or otherwise, endeavoring to depress the labor cost of coal produced by union mine labor; also whether in the said coal fields wage contracts have been abrogated or repudiated, whether defenseless men, women, and children, without cause, have been evicted from their homes, and generally what has transpired in the said coal fields, and the reasons for conditions and happenings therein; and in this connection the said committee shall ascertain whether in industrial disputes or strikes in said coal fields injunctions have been issued in violation of constitutional rights, and whether by injunction or otherwise, the rights granted by the Constitution of the United States have been abrogated and denied.

The balance of the resolution provides for the customary subpœnas of witnesses, the contingent expenses, and how the report shall be made.

THE DUTY OF CONGRESS TO ACT

Those who have investigated and are investigating conditions in western Pennsylvania, if they investigated as I have investigated, will sustain the charge of incredulous cruelty; of man's inhumanity to man. They will find, as I have found, that greed and avarice were practiced with impunity; that the gun and the blackjack were given precedence over law; that there was a place where American citizenship did not count; that there was a place where American love of fair play was absent. If the findings were otherwise, I would not be justified in appearing here and requesting the passage of such a resolution.

But knowing conditions as I know them, it is my fervent belief that it is the duty of the House, as the representative of the people of the United States, to provide for such an investigation, so that the great majority of the American people who believe in right over might; who believe that all men are equal before the law; who believe it is the duty of every man and every corporation to make the world a little greater and a little better, will have an opportunity to reflect and to ponder over the barbarous treatment accorded the men, women, and children of the bituminous coal fields of western Pennsylvania.

THE RIGHTFUL ORDER MUST BE RESTORED

It is, in my opinion, the duty of Congress to determine the reason why great corporations lose American ideals in the maelstrom of avarice. It is the duty of Congress to aid in the restoration of righteous industrial conditions. It is the duty of Congress to insist that law and order prevail. It is the duty of Congress to insist that courts of equity order and decree, as it was rightfully intended, with justice for all and favors for none.

It is the duty of Congress to view the economic, industrial, and judicial and interstate ills and prescribe lasting remedies.

THE INTERESTS INVOLVED

On August 10, 1925, when the Jacksonville agreement, to which the vice president and general manager of the Pittsburgh Coal Co. had set their signatures, had a year and nine months to run, notices were posted at all the company's mines announcing that wages were to be slashed one-third, or from $7.50 to $5 a day.

The employees of the company refused to be parties to this breach of faith, and thereupon an army of nonunionists were imported from Alabama, Tennessee, Virginia, Kentucky, and other States, and all those negroes knew about mining coal is what they learned in the convict coal mines of their respective States, they having been sentenced to said mines instead of jail after being convicted for violation of law.

THE WHOLESALE EVICTIONS

In order to house these scabs the coal companies began the wholesale evictions, which have since spread throughout western Pennsylvania, encouraged and sustained by an injunction issued by Federal Judge Schoonmaker. Within six months nearly every employee who was a member of the union had been driven from his home.

The action of the Pittsburgh Coal Co. was followed by the Bethlehem Mines Corporation, a subsidiary of Bethlehem Steel, and the Consolidation Coal Co., a subsidiary of the Standard Oil. Appeals were unheeded.

Other operators in western Pennsylvania were persuaded or coerced into joining these tremendously wealthy concerns, but the struggle did not become general until the expiration of the Jacksonville agreement.

MINERS AND OPERATORS UNABLE TO REACH AN AGREEMENT

Miners and operators met in Miami, Fla., on February 14, 1927, for the purpose of drafting a new national contract. The operators insisted on a heavy reduction in wages, which the representatives of the miners refused to accept, so the meeting adjourned in a deadlock.

On April 1, 1927, the Jacksonville agreement expired, and the miners in all the union fields suspended work.

Three days before this the policy committee of the United Mine Workers agreed upon a marked concession from the usual policy of the union.

In the interest of a peaceful and speedy settlement and to avoid all possible suffering and inconvenience to both miners and friendly operators, it was decided that the various districts would be allowed to make individual contracts based on the Jacksonville scale. These were to continue until a national agreement had been secured.

INDIVIDUAL SETTLEMENTS EFFECTED

Montana, Michigan, Wyoming, and part of Washington immediately signed up, and production was resumed.

In Illinois the mines were shut down until October 1, when, after a conference at Chicago, it was decided to continue the old agreement until April 1, 1928.

Iowa, Oklahoma, Arkansas, Kansas, and Missouri followed the example of Illinois and are now paying the union scale, except in a few districts.

While the Indiana operators refused to sign as an association, individual mine owners came into line, and now about 60 per cent of the output of the State is produced under union conditions. The same situation prevails in Ohio, except that the number of union operators is much smaller.

During this entire period the western Pennsylvania operators, dominated by the Pittsburgh Coal Co., stood adamant against any settlement with the union.

The central Pennsylvania operators, who had signed the temporary agreement, were induced to break away and join the diehards of Pittsburgh on July 1.

This leaves the strike at present confined to the western and central Pennsylvania fields and to a majority of the operators in Ohio and northern West Virginia.

THE REPUDIATED CONTRACT QUOTED

I wish to place in the RECORD a copy of the Jacksonville agreement in order that the solemn and morally binding character of this repudiated contract may be understood:

JACKSONVILLE AGREEMENT

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., February 19, 1924.

The following agreement was entered into by the representatives of the coal operators and miners of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and western Pennsylvania:

1. This joint conference of operators and miners of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and western Pennsylvania, as now constituted, hereby reaffirms the wage-scale contracts now existing between the United Mine Workers of America and the coal operators whose interests are represented in this conference, and hereby extends the same for a period of three years, from April 1, 1924, to March 31, 1927, in all of their terms, provisions, and conditions. It is understood the execution of this interstate agreement extends, without further negotiations, the district and subdistrict agreements now in effect in the districts affected.

2. That an interstate joint conference of the central competitive field shall assemble the second Monday in February, 1927, at Miami, Fla., and the president of the United Mine Workers of America and the chairman of the joint interstate conference are authorized and instructed to send out notices at the proper time as to the assembling of the conference.

For the operators: Rice Miller, H. C. Perry, P. H. Penna, Hugh Shirkie, S. H. Robbins, J. R. Biddle, J. A. Donaldson, William Henderson.

For the mine workers: Frank Farrington, Harry Fishwick, John Hessler, William Mitch, Lee Hall, William Roy, P. T. Fagan, William Hargest.

Officers of joint conference: Michael Gallagher, chairman; William Green, secretary; Ezra Vanhorn, assistant secretary.

International officers United Mine Workers of America: John L. Lewis, president; Philip Murray, vice president; William Green, secretary-treasurer.

Let us start out then by quoting a few statements, which I believe will give the Members of the House the atmosphere of western Pennsylvania better than I can in my humble way convey to you.

HELL ENLARGING ITSELF

Here is a statement made by the Rev. George Hine, a Baptist minister of Saltillo, Pa.:

Hell is enlarging itself in Pennsylvania. The pot is boiling here, and when it boils over there is sure to be bloodshed.

That statement does not come from an agitator; it comes from a Baptist minister.

Here is another statement:

The Vesta Coal Co. had a gang of gunmen evicting the strikers in that locality, when the officials of the mine workers' union appealed to Joe Edwards, the general manager of the company, to postpone the eviction for a few days until the union could construct barracks to care for the women and children.

HUMANITY TOLD TO GO TO PERDITION

"In the name of humanity do not put these women and children on the roadside these cold nights," said the union official in his appeal to Edwards.

Edwards reply was:

To hell with humanity. I hope they will freeze and rot.

Oh, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, this is the terrible situation. I have here a letter addressed to the House of Representatives of the United States which came in the mail yesterday; I hope you will pay attention to the language of this letter and its construction:

A BLOTCH ON SAVAGERY

718 LINDEN AVENUE,
Johnstown, Pa., February 4, 1928.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.:

Upon my own volition as a citizen, and without the knowledge of a living soul, I am writing this to request that Pennsylvania be no longer considered a part of the United States. The manner in which this State has been ruled or overruled since the coal miners' strike would be a blotch upon savagery.

I am not a miner, but I know of many cases where peaceable and worthy citizens have been driven from our public highways by vicious, bully State police. They were halted, cursed, and threatened in the vilest, basest manner never conceived of by humanity since the world began.

Horses, clubs, and pointed weapons were used, coupled with the most sanguine threats of violence ever heard by mortal man. All this was issued with the malicious intent to create riots and bloodshed.

I appeal to you in the name of God and righteousness that some steps be taken to civilize Pennsylvania.

I remain, respectfully yours,

ARTHUR J. BENDLE.

APPEALING TO THE GOVERNMENT FOR PROTECTION

This letter was not written by a coal miner, but, like the statement which I have just read to you, which came from the minister of the Baptist Church located at Saltillo, Pa., it is the honest expression of outraged, honest men who are not miners and who are citizens of the United States appealing to this great Government for justice.

THE PRESS IS AROUSED

Not only has protest after protest come from citizens of the highest standing in all walks of life but the great press of this country has been induced by the public indignation, manifested in all quarters, to send investigators to these stricken communities.

LABOR

The national weekly organ of the railroad unions sent a representative to Pittsburgh, who accompanied me on a part of my investigation.

One of the first experiences we encountered was that of seeing the inmates of a bawdy house, maintained on company property and in a company house, haled before Justice of the Peace J. M. O'Rourke.

DEPLORABLE CONDITIONS OPEN AND FLAUNTED

Twenty-three negroes, 8 women and 15 men were taken from a disorderly house by a member of the State constabulary. This house was inside the deadline maintained by coal and iron police, and in a company building.

At the same time a collection of bottles, containing the vilest-smelling alcoholic decoctions, was piled on a table in O'Rourke's office. These, I was told, had been taken from the scabs.

When sentences to pay fines of varying amounts or serve terms of 30 days or thereabouts in jail were pronounced, it developed that the 15 negro scabs, lured to the mining camps by tales of fabulously high wages, had only $29 coming to them in wages for several days' work.

Here is a statement made by the distinguished Member of the House from the thirty-third district of Pennsylvania, Mr. KELLY, as to the character of the strike breakers:

Never before in the history of industrial disputes in any civilized country have entire communities, numbering thousands of men, women, and children, been deported from their homes by private armies of mercenaries acting as public officials, but paid from private funds.

MOST UNDESIRABLE TYPES

These refugees have been replaced by persons of the most undesirable type, not only as workmen but as residents in our cities. This is shown by the large number of colored men, who, because of lack of experience, are being injured in our mines and are becoming burdens on our charitable institutions.

NOTORIOUS VIOLATIONS OF THE PROHIBITION LAWS

Further testimony as to the deplorable moral conditions prevailing in the coal camps is found in a protest sent by Vice President Phil Murray, of the United Mine Workers, to the head of the Federal prohibition enforcement service:

"While the conditions to which we direct your attention are common in the mining camps of western Pennsylvania, known as the Pittsburgh district," said Mr. Murray, "we call your special attention to the notorious violations of the Federal prohibition law in the camps of the Pittsburgh Coal Co."

The Pittsburgh Coal Co. is owned by the Mellons. Andrew Mellon, before becoming Secretary of the Treasury, was a director of the company. Upon entering the Cabinet he turned this position over to his brother, R. B. Mellon.

As Secretary of the Treasury Mr. Mellon is, through the Internal Revenue Bureau, the head of the Federal prohibition enforcement forces. Thus, what the miners are asking is that Secretary Mellon investigate appalling conditions alleged to exist in one of his own properties.

The letter states that nearly 100 murders have occurred in the scab camps, "many of which can be traced to the effect of bootlegging liquor."

DRUNKEN BRAWLS OF COMMON OCCURRENCE

"Drunken brawls are of common occurrence," it continues. Fights and assaults by drunken men and women no longer attract even passing attention. Men and women bootleggers supply liquor to these camps and peddlers of dope circulate among the employees.

It is notorious that this condition has existed in the camps of the Pittsburgh Coal Co. for many months without interference by officers of the law.

"It would be impossible for the Pittsburgh Coal Co. to be ignorant of these wholesale law violations," Vice President Murray says, inasmuch as the "company maintains a large force of private police, who pay no attention to bootleggers, dope peddlers, and addicts."

It is alleged that this deplorable situation arose because of the difficulty encountered in maintaining a force of scabs lured to the mines by stories of big wages and good conditions. When thousands refused to go to work or threatened to leave, "bootleggers, dope peddlers, and prostitutes made their appearance as an inducement to remain."

While some of the camps of other companies are said to be "infested with like conditions," the Pittsburgh Coal Co., by far the largest in the field, and one of the largest in the world, is said to be the first to inaugurate these policies.

That the charges made by Mr. Murray are fully warranted is proven by the fact that the prohibition enforcement officers in Pittsburgh, spurred to activity by the resulting storm of public protest, immediately raided a number of disorderly houses in the mine camps.

A TYPICAL STRIKE BREAKER

Here is another picture—a bewildered and ignorant negro, whom I interviewed when in the strike district. He was known as "Strike-breaking Bill." Under cross-examination by myself and the representative of Labor, he confirmed every charge which has been made as to conditions among the "scabs."

"Where did you come from?" was asked.

"I'se fum No'th Ca'liny," he responded.

"How long have you been strike breaking?"

"Well, boss, I'se been in a heap of strikes. I just don't remembah."

"Did you ever make any good money?"

BUSTED, HIS MIDDLE NAME

"No, suh. I always went to them jobs busted and left the same way."

"How are you making out here?"

"Not so good, boss, not so good. Things is gettin' mighty tough 'round heah. When I comes they pays me dollah and one cent fuh a ton of pick wuk. Then they cuts me to ninety-fo' cents and now they only pays eighty-fo' cents."

"How much do you make?"

"Well, suh, I makes by my 'count 'bout hundred and eighty-fo' dollahs last month."

"How much did they give you?"

"Well, boss, I gets thutty dollars scrip and they checks me off foty dollahs fo' bo'd."

"What became of the other $110?"

"I doesn't know exactly, suh; different things."

"Did you buy any clothes?"

"No, suh, I didn't buy no ga'mints."

WORKERS ARE PAID IN SCRIP

At this point Bill rolled his eyes and refused to answer any more questions until assured that "none of them coppahs was 'round."

Convinced of this fact, he then, in a confidential outburst, said:

"Hit don' do no good to kick. They keeps the books. So what can yo' do. I'ss gettin' mighty discu-aged. I'se all scrip up so I haint got nothin'."

A former checkweighman asked him how much they were allowed for a car of coal.

"'Bout thutty or thutty-fo' hundred," he responded.

According to this union checkweighman the correct weight is around 4,500 pounds.

"Well, boss," remarked poor, bewildered Bill, scratching his wool, "I guess tha's right. They cuts yo' every way they knows how."

In addition to a program of systematic debauchery of the strike breakers, they are so miserably underpaid as to be unable to purchase even the barest necessities of life. The following is the wage scale of the Mellon concern, the Pittsburgh Coal Co.:

PITTSBURGH COAL CO. NEW WAGE SCALE

The severe depression in the coal market at the present time makes it necessary for us to readjust wages. We feel that the scale listed below will result in more work for you.

Beginning January 10, 1928, wages in effect at this mine will be as follows:

	Scale	Jacksonville scale	Cut
Tonnage rates:
Pick mining	$0.85	$1.11	$0.26
Loading after machines	.58	.77	.19
Cutting, short wall or breast machines	.11	.17	.06
Yardage rates (rates per yard):
Loading in entries, entry break throughs and necks	.74	.97½	.23½
Cutting in entries, entry break throughs and necks	.18	.24	.06

No change in dead work (don't pay any).

Tipple labor	4.08	6.60	2.52
General outside labor	4.08	6.60	2.52

But this is not the worst. The strike breakers are being overcharged by the company bookkeepers.

It is the common practice to charge up against the poor, ignorant strike breaker every cent he may be credited with having earned. So common is this practice that there is a slang phrase to describe it.

THE "THREE PINK KISSES"

Here is one of the so-called "three pink kisses" statements. At the end of two weeks when the miner has nothing coming to him, the company indicates that by placing on the statement at the place marked "balance due" three red crosses. This is a typical statement, and it is nothing unusual under present conditions for a miner to receive "three pink kisses" at the end of two weeks' work.

WORKERS ALWAYS IN DEBT TO THE COMPANY

A boy, H. Gabel, earned $31.24 in two weeks. From this amount the company charged him 4 cents for smithing; $1.20 for rent; he was charged $30 for moving; making his debt just $31.24, the same as his earnings, leaving him no balance. This means that the man had to draw from the company's stores the food necessary to keep him and his family alive. Therefore, next week he will again be indebted to the company, and may run for weeks and weeks before he gets any cash at all in his pay envelope.

Here is another statement: This shows that the miner earned $21.48 in the two weeks, and again he is charged with equal amount by the company, leaving him only the three pink kisses for his pay day. In this instance he was charged $1 for assignments, 10 cents for smithing, $9.69 for his tools, $1.85 for powder, $8.23 for board, and 65 cents for an electric mine lamp.

I want the Members to note that the miners are required not only to pay for their tools but also for keeping their tools in condition—that is the item called smithing—and are charged with the cost of the powder used for blasting in the mine. He must also pay for his lamp and for the upkeep or fuel for the lamp, as the case may be.

Here is an even more interesting example: James Harrison was a strike breaker in the Pittsburgh Coal Co. mines. I was shown a slip for his earnings for two weeks ending April 30, 1927:

The slip shows that Harrison is credited with $39.58 for two weeks' work, ending April 30, 1927. This is at the rate of less than $20 a week for mining coal!

He was checked off for "miscellaneous items" amounting to $17.71, and the exact remainder, $21.87, was taken from him "for board."

It is the settled policy of those coal companies to keep the nonunionists "broke." Then they will have to stick to their jobs.

Two of the "miscellaneous items" are especially interesting. One is $5.50 for "check weighman."

There is no such position in the Pittsburgh Coal Co. mines. Check weighmen are found only in union mines. They are employed by the unions to prevent short-weighing the men on their coal. The union officials were perplexed and amazed at the effrontery of entering such an item in a scab's account.

But the second item is even more astonishing. The sum of $8.30 is entered as "miner's dues."

STRIKE BREAKERS ASSESSED TO PAY FOR ENSLAVEMENT

Officials of the United Mine Workers say they can prove that this charge represents the sum the operators are exacting from all scabs for "police protection."

In other words, they are forcing the scabs to pay the enormous bills incurred for coal and iron police, deputy sheriffs, stockades, machine guns, and other features of the State martial law which is being maintained in western Pennsylvania in order to break the union.

The strike breakers are kept in actual peonage and unmercifully beaten by the coal and iron police when they attempt to escape.

Here is another testimonial from one of the most conservative papers in the United States, the New York Daily News.

The News is supposed to have the largest circulation of any paper in the United States. Its owners are regarded as ultra-conservative. The writer of the articles on the coal situation, Lowell M. Limpus, got part of his education at West Point and served as an officer in the World War.

A PREJUDICED OBSERVER

He says very frankly that he went into the coal fields prejudiced against the miners and anxious to "show them up." For an entire month, accompanied by a photographer, he wandered through the coal camps, interviewing all classes, from the chiefs of the big corporations to the half-starved "kids" of the striking miners.

When the coal and iron police discovered what he was doing they threw Limpus and his photographer into jail; but, of course, they were soon released. You can not treat the reporter of a great newspaper like you would a striking coal miner!

In his first article in the New York News Limpus gives a summary of what he saw in Pennsylvania. He says, in part:

I have just returned from a visit to hell in Pennsylvania. I have seen horrible things there, things which I almost hesitate to enumerate and describe.

I can scarcely expect my story to be believed. I did not believe it myself when the situation was first outlined to me.

Then I went into the coal camps of western and central Pennsylvania and saw for myself.

For nearly a month Herbert J. McCrory, of the News staff, and I made the rounds of the strike-cursed towns. Many times it seemed impossible to think we were in modern, civilized America.

We saw thousands of women and children literally starving to death.

We found hundreds of destitute families living in crudely constructed, bare, board shacks. They had been evicted from their homes by the coal companies.

We unearthed a system of despotic tyranny reminiscent of Czar-ridden Siberia at its worst.

We found police brutality and industrial slavery.

We discovered the weirdest flock of injunctions that ever emanated from American temples of justice.

We unearthed evidence of terrorism and counterterrorism, of mob beatings, and near lynchings, of dishonesty, graft, and heartlessness.

MACHINE GUNS AND TEAR-GAS BOMBS READY

We located machine guns and tear-gas bombs prepared to back up the ready rifles that wait to crush any rebellion of hunger-crazed men, and near by we heard the children of those men, striking miners, crying for food in empty kitchens.

We interviewed strikers and prosperous coal company officials, magistrates and State police, priests and preachers, mine superintendents and company troopers, officials of organized labor, who are backing the strike to the limit, and the guarded strike breakers that work in the mines, sheriffs, deputies, merchants, and neutrals.

We were entertained, cajoled, persuaded, and browbeaten. We were threatened. We were praised. We were arrested, and we were released.

And we uncovered the truth.

The mine fields are a bubbling cauldron of trouble. If it boils over—and it threatens to do so—blood must flow freely and many lives pay the forfeit.

Regardless of who is right and who is wrong in the desperate strife between the operators and the 85,000 striking miners, the children constitute the tragedy of Pennsylvania to-day.

WHAT FANNIE HURST SAW

Fannie Hurst, one of the most eminent writers in America, also visited the coal fields. Here is a typical extract from a number of articles written by her:

It is less than two years since I returned from a tour of Russia, but in the brief survey of strike conditions in this city I can safely say that I have never beheld the equal of the scenes of human squalor, degradation, poverty, and misery that exist here on the outskirts of Pittsburgh. * * *

Regardless of who is right and who is wrong in the issues at stake, this uncivilized spectacle of families evicted from their homes and living like dogs among slops in kennels opposite the very thresholds of their vacant homes is wrong.

CHILDREN GO HUNGRY

Children are hungry and sore-eyed in these kennels. Mothers have not the milk for their wretched babies.

The civilization which countenances the wretchedness that exists along the hems of this fine city becomes a horror. * * *

This is Pittsburgh's fight This is America's fight. This is humanity's fight. Trade unionism, the right of man to organize and protect himself against man's inhumanity to man, is at stake.

Why, after two years and a half of an unspeakably degraded and degrading situation, is there no relief or end in sight? Why has there not been local or national intervention? Both sides say they would welcome it. Which side lies? Or do both? Or do neither? Why have the problems fundamental to this situation—overproduction, living wage, collective bargaining, interstate commerce, etc.—remained mere phrases—while Rome burns and Pittsburgh fiddles?

I shall have to hurry on, as I see my time is going quite rapidly, but I want to say to you this: I have not time to read it, but I have it here, and any of you men who are interested who will take the time to get a copy of the proceedings of the conference called by the American Federation of Labor in Pittsburgh on November 14, you will get there the story as it has never been told before and never will be told again.

ORGANIZED LABOR AROUSED

Let me say in explanation: When this strike was on and just preceding the convention of the American Federation of Labor held in Los Angeles last fall, the American Federation of Labor sent its trained investigators into the Pittsburgh coal fields, so that they might have the real facts to lay before the convention for such action as it might desire to take.

When these trained investigators made their report to the officials of the American Federation of Labor in convention at Los Angeles, the convention decided by a unanimous vote that the situation was too serious for them to pass judgment upon it at that time, with the result that they adjourned the convention and issued a call for a conference of all the officers of the international unions in the United States and Canada and of the State of Pennsylvania, so that they might canvass the situation and get the facts in relation to it.

That is the conference I speak of. At that time Mr. Philip Murray, vice president of the United Mine Workers of America and the official in direct charge of the strike in the coal fields of western Pennsylvania, made a statement with reference to the situation there. If you will get that statement and read it, it will give you all the information you desire. John Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers of America, made a similar statement, giving additional information to that given by Philip Murray, and, in addition, a former Governor of Pennsylvania, Hon. Gifford Pinchot, made a statement explaining the police powers of the State and sets forth their relation with reference to the industrial disputes that I am now speaking about. Those three statements tell the story as it has never been told before. They read as follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. GIFFORD PINCHOT

President Green, Mr. Lewis, gentlemen, I can not begin to say how much I appreciate what President Green was kind enough to say about me. If I came out of those four years at Harrisburg with the reputation of a square guy that is about all a man can hope for.

I have known Mr. Green for a great many years, and there are a great many among you here whom I have a right to class as my friends. Some of you I have fought side by side with in a good many fights. Phil Murray and John Lewis I fought with side by side in the last fight of the numerous fights in which I have been licked from time to time. That was in the fight for the senatorship. We were licked financially—financially, you hear me—morally we were not licked, and that is worth remembering; but I shall never cease to be grateful for the support the miners of Pennsylvania gave me then, and, more than that, because the miners of Pennsylvania in the east and in the west did what they said they were going to do and did it a hundred per cent. And I like that kind of thing.

I have a written speech—it is pretty tough on an audience to present a written speech, but I am no good at any other kind of speech, and I am not much good at this. I wrote it out because I think the questions you are going to deal with are as important as any questions that can be dealt with, and I feel very deeply about them. This is what I want to say:

The fundamental power of the State is the power to do justice. That power underlies every other. It is the power which gives the Commonwealth its reason and its right to live.

STATE MUST DO JUSTICE

The power to do justice is the duty to do justice. To do justice between man and man and between groups of men—justice to all alike, rich and poor, strong and weak, wise and ignorant, good and bad—justice without respect of persons, of position, of occupation, or of wealth.

Nowhere is the duty of the State to do justice more binding than in industrial disputes, for nowhere is human welfare and opportunity more directly at stake. To preserve the public peace, to protect both life and property, and to do it without fear or favor—that is to do justice when industrial conflicts are to the fore.

To do justice means that the State must neither harass capital nor bludgeon labor. To do either is to violate the basic principles of our Government. There has been little attempt by Government in the United States to harass employers in labor disputes, but there has been much bludgeoning of labor, and to bludgeon labor is little short of idiocy. I can think of no less likely way to get an American workingman back on his job.

The official or the administration which uses or winks at the use of the power of the State to coerce either labor or capital during an industrial dispute may think he is the friend of the side he favors, and so may the favored party. But they are both dead wrong. Justice is as much in the interest of the decent employer as it is of the decent employees, and injustice in the long run is fully as dangerous to the side that is unduly favored as it is to the side that is unfairly oppressed.

When the State exercises its powers with due consideration for justice and the lawful rights of all concerned, it keeps the door open to peace; but when it plays the part of the tyrant, it does what the tyrant has always done—it embitters those it brutalizes, turns peaceful contention into open warfare, prolongs the disputes it tries to foreclose, and produces the most valuable sort of ammunition for those who would pervert or pollute our national institutions.

VIOLENCE CAN BE PREVENTED

When both sides in an industrial dispute know that the State will give each a square deal, that neither will get more and neither less, that the State will smash and repress violence on one side as promptly as it will violence on the other side, that the State will not stand for transgression of the law no matter by whom, there is little, if any, danger of violence. Nine-tenths of the violence that occurs in strikes would be prevented by the mere exercise of courage and justice on the part of the men who have charge of the Government at the time.

During my four years at Harrisburg there were two strikes or suspensions in the anthracite region. In one of them the more than 150,000 anthracite miners were idle for more than five months in the longest suspension in the history of the hard-coal mines.

In the bituminous region of western Pennsylvania a very large percentage of the 300,000 soft coal miners were on strike almost continuously during the whole of my four years. These strikes in the bituminous field were caused by the failure of the operators to live up to the wage agreement made with the United Mine Workers at Jacksonville in 1923. They were accompanied by the most serious provocation, such as the eviction of men, women, and children, young and old, sick and well, from their homes in the dead of winter. Over this kind of outrage I had no legal power, but I checked some of it by vigorous public protests by name against the men and the companies who were guilty of it.

But neither in the anthracite nor in the bituminous field was there any serious public disturbance. There was scarcely the slightest disorder in either field during my four years which could not have occurred equally well if the mines had been working full time.

I do not know of any other four years in the history of Pennsylvania while strikes were going on when the State kept so scrupulously in the middle of the road, and when there was such complete freedom from riots and violence.

MINERS PEACEFUL AND LAW-ABIDING

For this there were three reasons. First, the miners and their leaders were essentially law abiding, and were not looking for trouble. It was the policy of the unions to avoid violence and preserve order.

Second, the miners knew they were getting a square deal from the State. They understood that the State had as much regard for human rights as it had for property rights.

Third, they were convinced, and so were the operators, that the State would instantly put down violence of any kind from either side, and would not allow itself to be made use of by either side.

Labor avoided violence because it had learned, not from hearsay but directly from me by word of mouth that I would stand for no violence. Capital ceased to employ its well-known methods of coercion in the coal fields because it had learned from me that I would not stand for violence. My business was to maintain the peace against any one who undertook to break it, capital or labor, gunmen or miners. I proposed to see that justice was done and that peace was maintained, and both sides knew it.

In strikes and suspensions in the mines before my time, the State took the side of the employer as a matter of course. It gave the employer the whole police power of the State to use in substantially any way he chose to use it. At his request it commissioned as special police officers, authorized to exercise the police power of the State, any men the employer chose to name, including in countless cases thugs and gunmen of the most depraved and despicable type.

COAL AND IRON POLICE INCITE VIOLENCE

These men were not protectors of peace but inciters to violence, for their interest was to bring about disorders in order to prolong their own employment. Consequently, they used violence to provoke violence so that they might be needed to repress it.

Then, after disturbances thus provoked took place, the Commonwealth sent the State police or the State militia to finish the job.

I do not say that the miners were always free from blame, but I do say they often had great provocation. I do not say that every operator was guilty, but I do say that many of them used men and methods that were both brutal and outside the law.

One of the pledges upon which I was elected was to give every man, woman, and child in Pennsylvania a Roosevelt square deal. In any strike that meant that I must keep the Commonwealth squarely on the side of peace and justice, and on no other side whatsoever.

Less than two weeks after I became governor I took the first step toward peace and justice in the coal fields by issuing an order to break up the current practice of commissioning criminals and other professional makers of trouble as coal and iron police.

On January 28, 1923, I issued a statement in which I said:

"Commissions as special policemen for corporation issued by the (previous) governor in the last two years number 5,800 * * * So far as I can ascertain, no investigation of any sort has ever been made into the character of any of these men by the State of Pennsylvania before intrusting them with the police powers of the Commonwealth.

* * * * * * *

"* * * (They have) not only been appointed without any effort to determine their fitness, but once appointed they are wholly without supervision by State authorities. * * *

"Hereafter no special policeman will be appointed, except in the event of some great emergency, until he has filled out satisfactorily a form giving full information concerning himself, and until his capability, reliability, and reputation for sobriety and peaceableness, as the law specifies, have been certified under oath by two reputable citizens of the Commonwealth who have themselves been Pennsylvanians for at least three years. * * *"

I intended to see to it, and I think it is fair to say I did see to it, that no more gunmen from New York and other places would be imported into Pennsylvania to make trouble here.

TWO-THIRDS GUNMEN

We began the elimination of the crooks and gunmen among the coal and iron police, and the application of the law's requirements to new applicants at once. We cleaned out two-thirds of them. Instead of the 5,800 promiscuous and largely criminal characters that held commissions as private policemen from my predecessor when I went into office, there were 2,000 reasonably decent officers when I left, and the State had made a thorough investigation of every one of them.

Some of the coal companies changed their attitudes and began sending in only the names of good men. These companies approved of and cooperated fully with the new position of the State. Other companies continued their effort to get commissions for plug-uglies and thugs—and did not get them.

Before I came into office these coal and iron policemen not only were given their commissions without investigation but they did their work without supervision from the State whose power they exercised. I put an end to that by appointing a State police officer whose courage and even-handed sense of justice had won him the confidence, both of the labor unions and of the better class of employers.

In a statement on December 6, 1923, I said:

"* * * Sergeant Freeman's duty will be to keep in close touch with the activities of private policemen, see that objectionable characters are weeded out from the force, or refused appointments, and that the abuses which have in the past been committed by private policemen are not hereafter repeated. * * *"

This marked the end of the worst of our troubles with the coal and iron police. What tendency to violence remained promptly disappeared, but until the very end of my term we continued to uncover a few cases of dishonesty among private policemen, some of whom had been stealing from their employers for years. They had been given the power to arrest and all the rest of it, but we put an end to that. Getting the private policemen cleaned up was a matter of not a little difficulty and importance, for there were twenty times as many of them as there were of the State police.

The State police themselves, to whose selection and training the State had given as great attention as it gave little to that of the special policemen before I came into office, were given the strictest orders to stay within their proper sphere of keeping the peace. They must not be for either side in any labor dispute, but only for the peace and dignity of the State. They took just that position and they handled themselves with a degree of impartial justice which won them the respect and confidence of operators and miners alike during my four years.

I have read with the deepest sorrow and indignation the account of the beating of men and women by police officers at Cheswick, near Pittsburgh, on August 22 of this year. Nothing like that happened during my time, for nothing like that would have been tolerated for one moment, and everybody knew it. The police reflect the will of the administration.

POLICE SHOULD NOT BE STRIKE BREAKERS

In spite of the vicious custom which has grown up in Pennsylvania, at the very outset of my term I made it clear that I would not stand for the use of the State police as strike breakers. From beginning to end of my four years I believe it is fair to say that the State police held the balance even in every labor dispute in which they were concerned. I had as many requests from labor to put or keep State police in neighborhoods where strikes were going on as from capital, and practically none from either side to take them out.

One fruitful source of trouble in the bituminous region I was not able, for lack of authority, entirely to control. That was the appointment of sheriffs of men hired by the companies to be deputy sheriffs in the strike areas. These hired deputies often or always found it to their advantage to promote disorder and prolong the strike. Furthermore, the most important, case after case came to my attention where sheriffs were paid by the coal companies so much per day for every man deputized by them at the companies' request.

These men were often fully as undesirable characters as those whom I had thrown off the list of State commissioned private policemen, but the mere knowledge that the administration meant what it said about preserving the peace, and would stand for no violence on their part, made them peaceable to a point that was unknown before.

In all this I did nothing but my obvious duty, and no man deserves much credit for that. I gave labor nothing to which it was not entitled and refused to capital nothing that it ought to have had.

But labor had had so much less than its due from the State, and capital so much more than its right, that my position was new and strange. I got much praise from organized labor and much blame from organized capital, when I deserved neither the one nor the other. I simply did the square and decent thing.

This meeting is a protest against the control of government by money for the sake of making more money. It is a protest against putting the dollar above the man and the woman and the child. It is a part of that great struggle which we face to-day in the United States as we never have faced it before in my time—the struggle to restore this Government to the ideals of the Constitution, to make it again what it is in theory but no longer in fact, a government of laws and not of influence, of honest votes and not of crooked money, of both human rights and property rights, and not of property rights alone, a government not of a ruling class, but of all the people.

The following speech was made to the conference by Phil Murray, who has been the field general of the United Mine Workers in this great fight for existence.

ADDRESS OF PHILIP MURRAY, INTERNATIONAL VICE PRESIDENT, UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA

Mr. President, distinguished guests, fellow trade unionists, at the outset I desire to express to the national and international organizations, the central trades bodies and the State Federation of Labor, as well as to the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, the appreciation of the United Mine Workers of America for your coming here this afternoon to give special consideration to the mining situation. I know that before you leave you will devise some definite policy having for its ultimate purpose something that will be of material benefit to the United Mine Workers of America and to the labor movement generally.

The story which I am about to tell you is an unusual one, in that it had its inception some 28 months ago with a powerful coal corporation abrogating the provisions and conditions of a contract made between the representatives of that coal corporation and the representatives of the United Mine Workers of America. This contract was negotiated in the city of Jacksonville, Fla., in the month of February, 1924, between the bituminous coal operators of the States of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and western Pennsylvania, and the United Mine Workers of America from the same territories.

Assisting in the making of that agreement we found, not only the representatives of the coal operators and the mine workers, but we also found substantial representatives of the Government of the United States, who, in the interest of the Nation, in the interest of the welfare of the people and to prevent the possibility of an industrial catastrophe, sought to bring about a wage agreement that would guarantee a continuity of production and assist in the stabilization of the bituminous mining industry.

A no less distinguished gentleman than Mr. Hoover, Secretary of the Department of Commerce, and Mr. James J. Davis, Secretary of the Department of Labor, loaned their high offices in behalf of the Government in an effort to compose the differences of the mine workers and the operators at that time and prevent a strike of magnitude. So when the Pittsburgh Coal Co. abrogated its contract with the United Mine Workers of America on August 10, 1925, they not only repudiated an agreement made with their own employees and our organization, but they also deliberately and maliciously slapped the Government of the United States in the face, in that they violated the promise they had made to the people of the United States when they signed that agreement to abide by its terms and provisions until March 31, 1927.

PITTSBURGH COAL CO. LEADS

Beginning on the 10th day of August, 1925, this Pittsburgh Coal Co., which employed approximately 19,000 coal miners in western Pennsylvania, had notices posted at the mines to the effect that from that date they expected to cut the wages 33⅓ per cent. They invited their employees to return to work—they were all members of the United Mine Workers of America—and asked them to join in a conspiracy to defeat the aims of an agreement which had been made between the representatives of both associations.

The members of the United Mine Workers of America refused to join the conspiracy, contending that their organization had an agreement, that it had been the fundamental policy of the mine workers' organization to at all times adhere strictly to the provisions of a trade agreement, and they would not join in a conspiracy to violate this agreement. The Pittsburgh Coal Co. thereupon imported from States south of the Ohio River, namely, Alabama, Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia, and elsewhere a large number of men to take the places of the union mine workers who had refused to accept a wage reduction.

To house these strike breakers they were importing into the mine fields of western Pennsylvania the Pittsburgh Coal Co. determined to prosecute a policy of wholesale evictions. As a result, within a period of six months they succeeded in evicting every former employee of that corporation who was a member of our organization. Following that action the Pittsburgh Coal Co. and the Bethlehem Mines Corporation, officered as it is by Mr. Schwab, abrogated its contract with the United Mine Workers of America, set the mine workers out in the street, imported strike breakers from almost every section of the United States, and proceeded with this unholy crusade to deflate wages and destroy the principle of collective bargaining. The work of strike breaking on the part of these two companies has continued for a period of approximately 28 months. Up to date, according to the best figures obtainable, there have been no desertions from the ranks of our organization among the former employees of these two organizations, so the mines that are conducting their crusade are manned by strangers imported from other States.

TYPE OF STRIKE BREAKERS

Who are those strangers? What type of men have been imported into the mining fields? Are they skilled miners? Does their productivity compare with that of the miners there formerly? Statistics show that the average productivity of those men is about 50 per cent efficient; that is, each strike breaker can produce approximately one-half as much coal as a union man formerly employed in those mines. The records which we have in our office, and which have been made public from time to time by the corporations, prove that statement.

Approximately 85 per cent of all the strike breakers who have been imported into the mining fields of western Pennsylvania are colored men without any previous experience in mining. They are of the lowest possible type, in that they have no particular aspirations; they are of the floating population who have no desire to improve themselves, their wives and families, the State or the Nation. They do not contribute in any way to the welfare of the Nation.

The record these strike breakers have made can be found—I speak of this with particular reference to the criminal record—in the office of the coroner of Allegheny County, Washington County, Westmoreland County, and Fayette County, and it will show that since the beginning of this strike-breaking campaign in the Pittsburgh district there have been approximately 85 murders committed in the mining camps among the strike breakers themselves.

No longer ago than last Friday two strike breakers were engaged in some kind of a game of chance in a den of iniquity at Red Hill, on the outskirts of this city, and as a result of a quarrel one took an ax and hit the other square in the face with it, scattering his brains on the floor. I could catalogue a large number of such murders that have been committed in the mining camps of western Pennsylvania by strike breakers and coal and iron police since the beginning of the present strike.

On the other hand, as to the observance of the law and respect for constituted authority, the United Mine Workers of America has made what it feels is a commendable record. In our communities we have maintained an observance and a respect for the constituted authorities that has won for us the commendation of the people who live in and around these mining communities. Our people have been persecuted; they have been browbeaten and bludgeoned by an army of coal and iron policemen, deputy sheriffs, recruited by these coal companies in numbers even exceeding the amount Governor Pinchot referred to as the number employed in the manufacturing industries and around the coal mines prior to his assuming the office of governor.

PROFESSIONAL THUGS EMPLOYED

There is no one here who is able to estimate the actual number of professional gunmen who are manning the properties of these coal corporations in western Pennsylvania. It is a safe and I believe a very conservative estimate to say there are at least 3,000 professional gunmen manning the coal mines in western Pennsylvania to-day. I have here a list of 218 affidavits in my hand, just collected recently. They were not collected through all the period of the strike, which has lasted 28 months, but in the last few weeks, each detailing some kind of atrocity that has been committed by a coal and iron policeman, a deputy sheriff, or a State policeman employed by some coal corporation in Western Pennsylvania. Here is one:

Last Thursday two members of the United Mine Workers' organization who never were arrested in their lives, who had never violated a law, were walking from their homes to the post office in a little mining town on the outskirts of Pittsburgh. They were accosted by five coal and iron policemen, and without any provocation taken to the barracks of the coal and iron policemen, beaten on their ribs, their stomachs, their faces, and their heads with the butt of a high-powered rifle. Then they were dragged to the county jail, taken before a magistrate, who is subsidized by the coal corporations, charged with disorderly conduct and a few other things, then held in $1,500 bail for offenses never committed.

I have a picture of one of them in my hand. His face is beaten beyond recognition. He lost all of his teeth and there is a cavity in the top of his head. His ribs are crushed. He is now at his home, and Dr. Paul Franklin, a reputable physician, says it is questionable whether he will live or not. This is only one out of the 218 cases we have the records of here, and there are thousands of others in our possession.

Here is a gentleman who, only 10 days ago, was clubbed over the head with an ax in the hands of a deputy sheriff. A friend rushed t( his assistance. The friend was almost naked; he rushed out of his house in his bare feet. The coal and iron policemen and deputy sheriffs picked both of them up, took them away, and their friends were unable to find them for three days.

CHILDREN ASSAULTED

I hold in my hand the picture of four boys, the oldest 10 years of age. They are the sons of miners who are on strike. These boys were arrested at the Cloverdale Mine, 4 miles out of Pittsburgh, for inciting to riot and disorderly conduct, and haled before a local magistrate. Talk about a travesty on justice!

I understand it is the purpose of this conference to investigate and look into the evidence which we are submitting here this afternoon. The conference can have these 218 affidavits, and if you decide to have the matter brought to the attention of the authorities or the Governor of our Commonwealth, the affidavits are at your disposal.

To-day in western Pennsylvania we have approximately 8,000 eviction cases pending; that is, we anticipate that some 8,000 families will be dispossessed of their homes in the mining camps of western Pennsylvania within the next six weeks. We are not at liberty to take advantage of the courts in an effort to test the validity of these company leases, for the reason that we have a Federal restraining order here, an injunction, and the court in its wisdom has decreed that no surety company can put up any bonds to protect any of the miners who occupy those houses, nor can our organization use its treasury to defend the occupants of those company houses in the courts of Pennsylvania. All that is necessary under the circumstances is for a coal company to issue a formal notice to one of the miners occupying one of its houses, notifying him to vacate, and if he does not leave within the specified time it is incumbent upon the sheriff of the county to throw his furniture out into the street.

Within the last three weeks the United Mine Workers of America has housed 1,500 families in the Pittsburgh district. We have built emergency houses, called barracks, for 800 of those families and provided shelter of different kinds for the remainder. There is a total of 45,000 mine workers in the Pittsburgh district affected directly by this strike. According to the figures which we have collected, there are 28,000 families in the district, a majority of whom will be affected by this eviction process.

Since the beginning of the strike in this district there have been 175,000 strike breakers imported into the mining communities of western Pennsylvania. If any of you men representing national and international unions will stay in the city over to-morrow I would like to have you visit Grant Street before you go, and Market Street, the headquarters of the Pittsburgh Coal Co., and the Wabash Building, headquarters of the Pittsburgh Terminal Co. If you do you will see a stream of strangers, coming from God knows where, being taken by runners to busses and trains to ship out to the mines to work as strike breakers.

You might ask if we have protested this abuse of the police powers in Pennsylvania. Shortly after April 1, as a result of an attack that was made upon our people by several State policemen at Bridgeville, a small community on the outskirts of this city, I went to Harrisburg and called upon the governor, acquainted him with the facts, and asked him for an impartial investigation. He told me he would detail certain special representatives of the Commonwealth to make a speedy investigation of the matter.

"MOCK" INVESTIGATIONS

As a result of my request, Captain Mock, of the State police, was delegated to make an investigation, to look into the conduct of his own fellow policemen. He visited Bridgeville, visited our district headquarters, made what he intended to be or what he called an investigation, and later submitted his report to the governor. The report was framed in language designed to defeat the aims of the United Mine Workers of America. It condemned the mine workers and their union and substantially blamed them for that affair.

I went to Bridgeville myself and called upon the business men, the doctors, the lawyers, and the churchmen. I asked them if they had attended this meeting of the mine workers' organization on April 1, when it was alleged the State policemen had ridden their horses through the crowds and trampled on women and children. They said they were there, and each of them gave an affidavit condemning the State policemen and upholding the mine workers' organization. They stated that none of our members had committed any violence at the meeting that day. Yet the governor accepted the report of Captain Mock and closed the incident. He never communicated with me at all.

State policemen are manning every strike-breaking mine in western Pennsylvania, and the same is true of central Pennsylvania. Many of them live in company houses and ride around in the automobiles of the superintendents. They ride their horses among women and children; they arrest people and hale them before local magistrates, testify against them, and do everything that is done by strike breakers to hamper the mine workers' organization.

SHERIFFS PROSTITUTE OFFICES

Sheriffs of the four counties comprising our jurisdiction in western Pennsylvania and the sheriffs of the mining counties in central Pennsylvania, shortly after April 1, issued proclamations prohibiting more than three miners from congregating at any place in any of these counties. We violated these sheriffs' proclamations and held our meetings; and then the coal companies asked for deputy sheriffs to enforce these proclamations. They recommended to the sheriffs the individuals they wanted appointed; they got their own men; and as a result hundreds of deputy sheriffs are also stationed at the mining camps of central and western Pennsylvania.

Each deputy sheriff is paid by the coal company. It is my understanding that each of these sheriffs receives a commission from the coal companies for giving them the services of the deputies, the commission amounting to from $3 to $5. These deputy sheriffs are not sympathetic; as a matter of fact, they carry out the instructions of the superintendents of the mines and the policies of the companies. They do all the coal and iron policemen do and what many of the State policemen do.

You might ask: "What do the local authorities do about this? You have local policemen in those municipalities who are elected by the taxpayers. They are the regular peace officers." The coal operators of central and western Pennsylvania pay no attention to the peace officers; they ignore them, and see to it at all times that the work of maintaining the peace of the communities, as the coal companies see it, is carried out by State policemen, deputy sheriffs, and coal and iron policemen. You can appreciate from this the tremendous handicap the mine workers' organization has to overcome.

What virtue is there in the position the United Mine Workers have taken with regard to wages? Is there anything the public is not acquainted with as to the wages for which the mine workers are struggling? The mine workers of central and western Pennsylvania and West Virginia are fighting for a maximum wage of $7.50 a day for skilled men inside the mine, mechanics, the highest paid men in and around the mine. The disorganized condition of the industry enables them to get work to do approximately 160 days in the year. Multiply that by $7.50 and it amounts to a total gross earning of $1,200 a year. There isn't anything unreasonable in a demand coming from a man who works in a coal mine for a wage that will enable him to make $1,200 a year.

The representatives of the mine workers' organization, in an effort to compose the difference existing between the coal operators and the members of our union, have sought from time to time to set up what we believe to be constructive cooperating agencies, having for their ultimate purpose the stabilization of the mining industry of this country; but evidently the only solution the coal operators see lies in the direction of wage degradation and a lowering of our living standards.

OPERATORS WILL NOT NEGOTIATE

The strike which took place the 1st of April this year came about as a result of the unwillingness of the bituminous operators of the country to even negotiate, to even discuss from the standpoint of logic and reason the relative positions of both parties. The operators contended at the beginning of the conference that they must be given a wage reduction, and at the end of the conference they were still contending for that wage reduction, giving no consideration to constructive agencies that would have for their purpose a stabilization of the industry, that would guarantee our people a reasonable wage with greater continuity of employment.

That situation—and I speak now with particular reference to the Miami conference—brought about a suspension in Ohio and Pennsylvania, and included many companies that were formerly respecting the terms of their agreements with the United Mine Workers of America. Among the companies in western Pennsylvania whose mines closed down on April 1, and who have since been employing strike breakers, is the Pittsburgh Terminal Coal Co. Beginning the 15th of April this company started importing strike breakers.

They posted notices and gave interviews to the newspapers, advising the public through the medium of the press, that it was their purpose to give their employees a small reduction, with a guaranty of steady employment and that no further reductions would take place. As a result of this the company was able to induce a large number of union men from other States to come in as strike breakers. Shortly after April 15 the first wage reduction was put into effect, and the company went into the Federal courts of the State and sought what we know as the Terminal Coal Co. injunction. They succeeded in having this Federal court assume jurisdiction and set up Federal regulations governing the conduct of the mine workers engaged in this strike.

How serious and important the issuance of this injunction is to the labor movement generally can best be explained in this way: The mine workers' counsel contended that the Federal court was without jurisdiction, for the reason that no evidence was offered to show that members of the United Mine Workers of America, or the organization itself, had ever interfered with the shipment of coal after it had been mined, or had interfered with the consumption or sale of the commodity after it was shipped.

We sought to impress the court that there was no violation on the part of the mine workers' organization of any Federal statute, for the reason that we believed that before the Federal court could assume jurisdiction in a case such as ours there must be shown an intent on the part of the mine workers' organization to commit, or the commission of, some act which had either interfered with the shipment of coal after it had been mined or its consumption after it had been shipped.

THE INJUNCTIONS APPEAR

However, Judge Schoonmaker assumed jurisdiction and then ruled that in the case of evictions, wherein the company was demanding the return of its houses, that the United Mine Workers of America could not after that date give any more assistance to the occupants of those houses in securing appeals to the superior court of Pennsylvania for the purpose of testing the validity of those leases. That is the extent to which the Federal court went to curb what we believe to be legitimate activities of the people engaged in that strike.

I have sought to show you in my own way that this fight through which the United Mine Workers of America is passing in the State of Pennsylvania is not an ordinary fight between any manufacturer and a labor organization, or between a coal company and the United Mine Workers of America. I have sought to prove that in addition to it being an industrial war between the United Mine Workers of America and these coal companies there is also what appears to be a damnable conspiracy on the part of certain politicians in Pennsylvania, cooperating with strike-breaking agencies, to crush the United Mine Workers of America in this State.

Every agency at the command of the sheriffs and the governor has been put to work to cooperate with the coal companies in their attempt to destroy our union. It is my judgment that consideration of this situation should be given before this conference, and the relations which evidently exist between the politicians who control the destinies of the people of the State and the coal companies who are strike breaking in Pennsylvania. I believe there is a conspiracy between these agencies, and I believe there are other conspiracies afoot that have for their purpose the defeating of the mine workers' organization.

We have in Pittsburgh a gentleman who has been negotiating with the United Mine Workers of America for a period of approximately 37 years, John H. Jones, of the Bertha Consuming Co., who owns a corporation that produced three and one-half million tons of coal a year. Six hundred thousand tons of this amount, according to his statement, are sold annually to the General Motors Co.

THE RULE AND RUIN POLICY

John H. Jones called the officers of the mine workers to his office one day in June and said: "I am prepared to sign the Jacksonville agreement with you boys; I can pay the wages provided in that agreement. I would like to open my mines up and go ahead and pay that wage, because I believe in harmonious relations between employer and employees. Yesterday I was told by the purchasing agent of the General Motors Co. that I can not sign the contract on any basis at all, and that I must conform myself to the policies of the Pittsburgh Coal Co. or they propose to ruin me."

Bankers in the city of Philadelphia, who hold the paper of the Bertha Consuming Co., advised Mr. Jones over the telephone the day I was there that they understood he was going to sign the contract, and that banking company forbade him to do so under penalty of surrendering his company to the banks that hold his paper.

Mr. Gilmore operates a small mine that employs 400 men. It has a daily output of 2,300 tons. He came to the office of the United Mine Workers of America a short time ago and said: "I have a sufficient amount of business at my disposal now to sell coal in the city of Youngstown, Ohio, at a contract price of $6 a ton delivered, and I can pay your wage agreement, but my mine is located on the Montour Railroad, which is owned by the Pittsburgh Coal Co.; the policies of the Pittsburgh Coal Co. are dominated and controlled, directly or indirectly, by the Mellon banking interests, of Pittsburgh, and they have told me that if I recognize your union and pay the wage I am ready to pay they will ruin me."

That is only part of the evidence, only some of the confessions that have been made by independent operators in the Pittsburgh district to officers of the mine workers' organization within a few weeks. Now, what is the Bertha Consuming Co. and the Gilmore Co. doing? They have strike breakers, they are evicting men from their homes, they have gunmen around their properties, and they tell the officers of the mine workers' organization that they were told to do it at the peril of having their properties taken away from them by this powerful group in Pittsburgh who are concentrating their efforts on destroying the United Mine Workers of America.

THE DISPOSSESSED ARMY

In the State of Pennsylvania we have 85,000 striking miners; we have 320,000 dependents, or a number approximating 400,000 people, who are being persecuted by those interests combining their influence for the purpose of defeating the aims of the common people. The time is here when we should focus our attention in a national way in the situation in this district. I feel that your decision in this matter and what you do after the meeting is over will do more good in the end to solve this problem of the mining industry than any other single thing I know of.

It has necessitated, of course, the expenditure of enormous sums of money to conduct this campaign in behalf of our people in the State of Pennsylvania. I am quite sure that you will give frank, free, and generous consideration of that phase of the situation. I am hopeful that you may direct your attention to the political phases of it in order that the government of our Commonwealth at least and other people who are connected in a high way in the affairs of our National Government may have it also brought to their attention in a way that will influence the situation sufficiently to warrant a square deal being meted out to the mine workers of the State of Pennsylvania.

The 405,000 members and dependents of our organization have their eyes focused upon this meeting to-day; they are living in the hope that out of this meeting there will come some action that will prevent a continuation of this crusade that is being conducted against the rights of the people by those combinations of wealth and politics in the State of Pennsylvania.

I could dwell at greater length upon the situation. I could give in detail countless numbers of incidents that have occurred during the progress of the strike, but that, it seems, would be superfluous. However, before closing I think I ought to say this to you so that you may have it indelibly impressed upon your minds. The Pennsylvania Railroad Co. is one of the largest consumers of bituminous coal in the Nation. As a matter of fact, the combined consumption of all the railroads in the United States represents approximately 33⅓ per cent of the total production of the Nation.

With this enormous purchasing power the railroads have evidently combined with large public-utilities companies, directed, as I hold, by no less a genius than Mr. Atterbury, president of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., to depress the price of coal to the lowest possible point, no matter what it may cost the men who mine the coal or the women and children dependent upon the men who mine it.

THE RAILROAD INFLUENCE

This program of the railroads, led by the Pennsylvania Railroad, has resulted in the purchasing agents coming to the independent commercial producers in cities like Pittsburgh, where they are operating under a contract with the mine workers' organization, and saying that, beginning with the month of December, they will supply coal to the Pennsylvania Railroad for $1.60, and they can make their wage scale accordingly.

The coal companies, lacking initiative, lacking organization, lacking a desire to remedy their own condition, surrender abjectly to the orders of the railroads and the large utilities corporations. They post notice that at a certain date reductions will be introduced to correspond to the reduction in their prices. The question of the wage, whether you have a contract or not, whether you have a trade agreement or not, according to the philosophy of the Pittsburgh Coal Co., the Bethlehem Mines Corporation, and others, is not one to be regulated by either an economic fact or the use of collective reason in the making of a trade agreement, but it is one that must be regulated by the influences of those large purchasers of bituminous coal in the United States, and particularly the influence of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co.

COMBINATION TO DEPRESS COAL PRICES

Our contracts, which were originally repudiated in the Pittsburgh district, came about as a result of the railroads combining to depress coal prices, going to the heads of concerns like the Pittsburgh Coal Co., saying they were going to cut prices, and the Pittsburgh Coal Co., rather than contend with the railroad company, reduced the wages of the miners. Our fight, whatever it may be, must be directed against these large consumers in the hope that the development of a healthy public sentiment might contribute something toward a healthy solution of that particular phase of the problem.

I hope before you leave the city you will take advantage of the opportunity to visit some of the mining towns in western Pennsylvania. Many of the mines are but a short distance from this city. I wish you could go to Russellville and see the colony that was built in 10 days to house 210 families. I wish you could go there and interview the men and women who live in those little homes built for them by the United Mine Workers of America and find out what they think of the strike and what their reaction to it is. If you do that you will have a greater appreciation of what the strike really means than you will through any description I can give you.

I hope you can go to Mine No. 3, Castle Shannon, and see the army of coal and iron police that are manning the property and the deputies that are patroling the street. Go to No. 4 and see the element that has been imported in there to take up the work left by the union mine workers. There are thousands of colored workers in the mines in the Pittsburgh district to-day who learned coal mining in the convict mines of Alabama and Tennessee. They never knew what it was to mine coal and make wages at it.

Go to the camps and talk to the men and women who belong to the mine workers' union and get their story of the element that has been shipped into the camps. Ask them the experience they have been required to undergo at the hands of the coal and iron police, the State police, and the deputy sheriffs. They will not only confirm, but they will add to what I have told you concerning the atrocities that have been perpetrated upon our people.

In closing, in behalf of our organization, I will express to you the appreciation of the mine workers for anything you may be able to do that will be of assistance to the United Mine Workers of America.

John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers, added his story of the conflict:

ADDRESS OF JOHN L. LEWIS, INTERNATIONAL PRESIDENT UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA

Mr. Chairman, members of the conference, there is little that might be said to supplement that marvelous human recital of conditions in this territory that has been given you by Vice President Murray. During all these long, weary months of industrial conflict in this region and contiguous territory he has, day after day and night after night, been visualizing the scenes he has described to you. He has only been prevented by lack of time from reciting to you the most harrowing tales of the human injustice and brutalities that have been visited upon the heads of numbers of men whose only crime is seeking to maintain their standard of living and their place as American citizens.

It is a great human paradox that those least able to care for children have the most to care for. As I stand here to-night I voice the expression and the hopes of 150,000 mine workers who are in the industrial trenches of this great coal-producing region, consisting of western Pennsylvania, the great coal-producing counties of central Pennsylvania, 12½ coal-producing counties of northern West Virginia, and all the great coal regions of the State of Ohio.

In these four districts we have 150,000 men who are systematically being crushed by the oppressive heel of American organized capital. And dependent upon these 150,000 men are 600,000 women and children, making a gigantic army of 750,000 souls who have no hope of life and no protection for the future except that which might be accorded to them by the United Mine Workers of America. Many of them have been on strike for a long period of time, and as the months go by their human necessities increase. Their savings have been exhausted, the individual credit has been overtaxed, their clothes are becoming worn out, and they are being evicted from their homes.

APPALLING LIVING CONDITIONS

These people are living under conditions which would astonish the citizenship of our great land were the facts only known in a manner that would cause the men and women of our country to see and to think. Thousands of them are being evicted from their homes. What are those homes? They are those characteristic coal-mine houses, the sight of which is familiar to many of you. Poorly constructed, offensive in design, covered oftentimes with a crude coat of red paint, inexpensive in construction, but in which many of these people have lived throughout their normal lifetime.

We have had people in the Pittsburgh district who lived in company houses as long as 28 years, whose children were born there, whose children were married from those homes, and they expected to spend their old age in the protection of those domiciles. But they have been ejected by the brutal arm of these coal companies without any consideration whatever because they refused, in the first instance, to become a party to breaking a wage agreement, and, in the second instance, because they refused to accept a lower wage and desert their trade-union organization.

To-day they live in mere shacks, a mere shelter from the weather erected by the United Mine Workers of America upon a piece of land leased, perhaps hard by, and daily they see their former homes occupied by the negro strike breakers from the cotton fields and the convict mines of the South and going into the mines to take their occupation. Can you imagine their feelings? And can you imagine the sacrifice they are making in order to remain loyal to their ideals?

We are furnishing them food, we are furnishing them clothing such as we may, we are furnishing them water, coal, medicine, and doctors. We care for them when they are born, we are providing their children in a small way with books in those places where books are not furnished, and we bury them when they die. The United Mine Workers of America is making that contribution, not alone to itself, not alone to its own members and its own people, but it is making that contribution to uphold the trade-union movement and to the citizenship of this country. These industrial heroes are fighting, not alone their own fight, but your fight and mine and all others whose lot is to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow.

THE FAR-REACHING CONSPIRACY

There is, as has been said by my distinguished colleague, a gigantic conspiracy upon the part of great combinations of American finance and capital to break the resistence of the mine workers' union in the coal industry. And, be it said, the people who are doing that recognize that when they accomplish what they have set out to do they will have taken a long stride forward and made a great step in advance in accomplishing the weakening of the entire labor movement of our land.

The Pennsylvania Railroad is one of the prime movers in that proposition; the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, serving this great eastern area, is likewise a participant in that great scheme. The New York Central Railway system has joined in recent months with those other combinations, and to-day they are all allied together in this great movement to uproot from these mining districts every vestige of our organization and remove for all time any interference with what they conceive to be their inherent right to raise or depress their wage schedules at will.

THE FREIGHT-RATE STRUCTURE INVOLVED

The freight-rate structure of American railways, which is a charge levied upon the consuming public, was predicated upon a fuel cost to the railroads of $2.25 per ton. Notwithstanding that fact, and notwithstanding the fact that the class A railroads of our country to-day are in a more prosperous condition than has been the case for a long period of time, we find these great combinations joining with the banking interests of Pennsylvania and adjoining States to secure the locomotive fuel which they use in such volume at a lesser and a lesser price.

The Pennsylvania Railroad in the State of Indiana, even since the settlement in midwestern fields, has served notice upon the producers who formerly served its requirements that it will not pay more than $1.75 per ton, and if they expect accommodation from the Pennsylvania Railroad they must accommodate their wage scale to that fixed charge.

In northern West Virginia and central Pennsylvania the railroads are buying coal for as low as $1.60 and in some instances as low as $1.40 a ton. The New York Central in recent months has been granting increases to certain classes of employees, and, on the other hand, has been undertaking a strike-breaking policy in its mines in this State. And thereby hangs a tale.

GOVERNOR FISHER A "PARTY AT INTEREST"

May I ask if President Marks, of district No. 2, is in the hall?

President MARKS. I am.

President LEWIS. Has the Clearfield Bituminous Coal Corporation undertaken to reduce wages and employ strike breakers and attempted to evict our people?

President MARKS. Yes.

President LEWIS. And employ coal and iron police and State policemen and deputy sheriffs?

President MARKS. Yes.

President LEWIS. You know the Clearfield Bituminous Coal Corporation is owned by the New York Central and that the Governor of Pennsylvania is a director of the Clearfield Bituminous Coal Corporation?

President MARKS. My understanding is that he is their attorney also and a member of the board of directors.

President LEWIS. That will clear some of the political equations in the minds of some of you men.

President MARKS. I have here copies of injunctions that have been issued to them.

President LEWIS. May I ask if the Pennsylvania Coal & Coke Co. is doing the same thing?

President MARKS. Yes.

President LEWIS. And you know that they lease their lands from subsidiaries of the New York Central?

President MARKS. Yes.

POLICE RAN AMUCK

President LEWIS. That simply shows the degree to which this conspiracy goes, and gives a possible motive why the Governor of Pennsylvania has permitted his State police and the coal and iron police and the deputy sheriffs of this State to run amuck in the coal fields perpetrating the things which have been revealed to you here.

In view of these conditions, and in view of the revelations made by Vice President Murray as to conditions existing, the mine workers may well call upon organized labor of America to join with them in protesting against these injustices and help to awaken, as this meeting is doing here to-day, the eyes of thoughtful citizens throughout the length and breadth of the land to the necessity of giving a square deal to the men who work in the mines.

The former governor of this Commonwealth, the Hon. Gifford Pinchot, has rendered a great service here to-day in showing this audience and in showing the citizens of this State the manner in which the police powers of the State could be exercised in a fair manner, and the manner in which it was exercised under the administration of an honorable and honest man.

STATE AUTHORITIES SHOULD BE CALLED TO ACCOUNT

The prominent political interests in Pennsylvania who are responsible for the election to the highest office in this State of the attorney, vice president, and director of one of these strike-breaking coal companies, and the political powers in Washington who constantly give comfort and counsel to these same interests should be compelled to assume their proper responsibility for the continuance of such a policy and by this means of making known the facts here to-day to the citizenship of our country may come a great moral influence for improvement and betterment.

The story told here to-day should carry conviction into the mind of every man; it should reveal a degree of human effort, human sacrifice that is being made by these tens of thousands of men who are in the mining camps of this area to-day. They are placing upon the altar of trade-unionism everything that they hold dear to themselves; they are exhausting their personal resources; they are exposing their breasts to the clubs of their oppressors, and they are carrying on, as they will continue to carry on, with a determination not to yield to injustice and not to surrender and pull down the banners of trade-unionism in our land. And in doing this they are looking forward to being upheld and morally sustained by the great army of organized labor throughout the land who sympathize with them in every way.

The hour is late, and I will not detain you. I want to express the appreciation of not only myself and my fellow officers in the United Mine Workers of America, but I want to extend to you the appreciation of that gigantic army of boys and girls, and haggard, ill-clad, and undernourished women, and those stalwart men who inhabit these mining communities in the area of which I spoke, who are glad, first, that you have come here and who, secondly, will be glad for anything you may do to help and aid and encourage them in their hour of discontent and the winter of their great need.

WHAT THESE SPEECHES SHOW

Mr. Lewis and Mr. Murray said that about the time the Jacksonville agreement was to expire—that means the contract between the coal operators and the miners' union—it appeared as though there would be a break in the negotiations to renew the contract. It appeared as though the country was going to be thrown into a nation-wide mine strike. The President of the United States, acting in behalf of all the people, very wisely had the Secretary of Commerce, Herbert Hoover, and the Secretary of Labor, James Davis, speak in the name of the Government of the United States for the purpose of trying to compose any differences that might exist between the miners and the operators, with the result that their efforts were very successful, and with the further result that the administration and both Secretaries got unstinted and deserved praise for the service they rendered their country.

OPERATORS DEFY GOVERNMENT

But lo and behold! When it came to operating the mines under that contract, voluntarily entered into by the operators and the miners, with the approval of the Government of the United States, Secretary of Labor Davis and Secretary of Commerce Hoover, the Pittsburgh Coal Co. refused to comply with the provisions of the contract and closed their mines, thereby locking out the union miners of that particular company.

That was nearly three years ago. And then, following that, when they thought they had the miners starved into submission, when mine employees' feet were on the ground because of no shoes to wear, and the children were hungry and their wives depressed, then they said they would open the mines; they posted their proposed wage scale, which called for a reduction in wages in many instances of as high as $2.52 a day, and invited the miners to come back to work under the company's own agreement, after the company had repudiated the contract entered into between the miners and the operators.

And, of course, the miners employed by this particular company, all being members of the United Mine Workers of America, refused to be parties to the violation of a solemn agreement entered into by their representatives and representatives of the coal companies, because the United Mine Workers of America hold sacred the provisions of every contract entered into by their representatives and the operators.

Here they were asked by the coal companies to violate that principle, but they refused to do it. That was the inception of the lockout.

FORCING DOWN THE PRICE OF FUEL

Then we find pressure brought to bear. We find the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., and the New York Central Railroad Co. making a drive to force down the price of fuel coal.

Let me say in passing that the railroads consume at least 33⅓ per cent of the annual production of bituminous coal in the United States, and, of course, no operator wants to lose that market. But the railroad companies took this position: That, notwithstanding the fact that in fixing the freight and passenger rate structure by the Interstate Commerce Commission, they in their application for the fixing of said rate structure stated that it cost them $2.20 and $2.40 a ton for fuel coal, and the Interstate Commerce Commission gave them rates based upon that fuel cost of $2.20 and $2.40 a ton, while they at the same time were beating down the price to $1.50 and $1.60 a ton, and the people of the United States were paying and are paying freight and passenger rates on the basis of $2.20 and $2.40 a ton for fuel coal.

Then we find some of these operators who had been operating their mines for 40 years, negotiating with the miners' unions and entering into contracts with them every time a contract expired, said to the officials of the miners' union—I will put the names of the coal companies and everything connected with this matter into the RECORD—these operators said: "We are ready and willing and anxious to enter into an agreement with you and your organization; you have always treated us fairly; we can pay the wages and we can make profits by working under the Jacksonville agreement, but we are prevented from doing so."

PUBLIC UTILITIES COERCE OPERATORS

For instance, we will take the Jones Coal Co. The president of that company made that statement to the officials of the miners' union, but he said, "I can not do it because the General Motors Co. has forbidden me to do so." Here we have the situation where independent, free-thinking, patriotic American men at the head of industry, who want to comply with the sacredness of contract, solemnly entered into, saying they can pay the wages and make profits for their concerns, but right above these men are corporative heads who say, "If you do, we will ruin you; we will drive you out of existence." And the sad part of it is that is just what would happen. And at the same time this was going on, the Philadelphia banks could not take the time to write a letter or send a telegram to Mr. Jones, but called him on the long-distance telephone and said, "We understand you are thinking about entering into a contract with the miners with certain qualifications, and we say to you that if you do that, or if you enter into any kind of a contract, we will ruin you."

THE DIRE THREATS OF HEARTLESS CORPORATIONS

They went further and said, "If you do not follow the lead of the Pennsylvania Coal Co., in violation of your contract, in the eviction of your women and children, we will take your credits away from you and throw you into bankruptcy." These are the conditions in Pennsylvania, my friends—not very pleasant information for free Americans. They are the conditions about which we are appealing to you to-day in order that you may do what you can to relieve the situation.

You may ask, "Well, what is the matter with the authorities of the State of Pennsylvania?" That is a proper question. In the statement made by Mr. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers of America, at the Pittsburgh conference he developed the fact from Mr. Marks, president of the miners' union in the central Pennsylvania district, that the present Governor of the State of Pennsylvania is on the board of directors of and the attorney for one of the coal companies which is a subsidiary of the New York Central Railroad, and every power at his command—the constabulary, the coal and iron police, and the deputy sheriffs—has been used for the purpose of breaking down the resistance of the miners' union and in the effort to starve into submission the bituminous miners of western and central Pennsylvania.

SERIOUS CHARGES AGAINST THE GOVERNOR

When this conference at Pittsburgh, above referred to, adjourned, it did so with instructions to its committees to carry this message to the Governor of Pennsylvania in person, so that he could no longer say, "Well, that is news to me; I am surprised." That conference went further. It directed the president and secretary of the great American Federation of Labor, the great leader of the Mine Workers of America, John Lewis, and others to speak for that conference, which represented labor, and instructed them to place these facts before the President of the United States.

IT IS EASY TO EVADE

When these facts were presented to the President of the United States, we had the right to expect that the President, who was so interested in relieving the distress of women and children in the Mississippi Valley, who was so interested in relieving the distress of the women and children and refugees in the flood districts in the New England States, who was so interested in endeavoring to preserve the peace of the land and endeavoring to avoid a nation-wide strike in the bituminous coal fields that he authorized Herbert Hoover and Secretary of Labor Davis to prevent it—we had the right to expect when these conditions were laid before our President—my President and your President—that something would be done to at least relieve the distress. He said in response to the charge of a conspiracy between the railroads to violate the contract and beat down the price of fuel coal: "Your place is not here; go to the Interstate Commerce Commission."

WHAT WOULD WILSON OR ROOSEVELT HAVE DONE?

What would Woodrow Wilson or Theodore Roosevelt have done if a similar appeal were made to them? Would they have evaded direct action? Would they have suggested a conference with the Interstate Commerce Commission? Certainly not.

Would those two great Americans have said after being told of the human sufferings that the bituminous-coal industry was in a transitory stage and nothing of a practical nature could be accomplished until a reorganization had been effected? Oh, no! Not they. They would have placed human happiness and human righteousness before industrial warfare.

Wilson and Roosevelt by their acts have shown that life is only valuable according to the good influence that goes out from life. They stood out preeminently in our Nation's history, because as individuals each was absorbed with the spirit of freedom and brotherly love which dominated their lives. They were actuated by the principle, which forms the foundation stone of the Constitution, that all men are created equal; that men are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. And it was to these rights of men that they devoted their lives.

BOTH ACTED FOR THE GOOD OF HUMANITY

Did Wilson or Roosevelt when the suffering, distress, and hopes and aspirations of the miners were told to them turn evasively away and suggest the need of additional legislation before they could rightfully interfere? Oh, no! Not they. They directed the coal operators to appear at the White House. And when they did arrive these mine owners were told in terse and emphatic terms that the mighty strikes then in vogue must cease or else the Government would intervene and assume control. And the conflicts did cease, and to-day and every day from now until the end of time the names of Wilson and Roosevelt are first in the hearts of men, women, and children of the anthracite coal regions.

A GREAT OPPORTUNITY LOST

I desire to add that it is to be regretted that the State and national administrations did not make a study and endeaver to cope not only with adverse conditions found in western Pennsylvania but with the present growing problem of unemployment. However, it is natural to expect that when they are remiss in one humane undertaking that they would be remiss in them all. If a falling off in employment, a decline in wages in certain industries, financial embarrassment in others; the awful affliction of want for thousands of American men and women, and an intense struggle for the right to bargain collectively, happens to come in an election year and reflects on the State and national administrations in power, it is unfortunate; but there is no good reason why they should have fallen flat, without vision and without direction.

This is the time for a display of red blood. This is the time the administrations should be up and doing, showing to the people that they have initiative, that they are human, and that they stand squarely for better and greater things. I realize that Congress, aside from directing that all Government work contemplated should be started at once and directing an investigation in western Pennsylvania, can do but little. But it can do that much, and it should proceed at once. Such procedure may be embarrassing to the leaders, who have laid their plans to conduct the coming campaign for a new lease of power for their party on the issue of "unparalleled prosperity." It may be embarrassing to find the unemployment increasing in many industries all over the country. It may be embarrassing to them to find wages in numerous lines decreasing due to part-time employment. And it will always be embarrassing to find over, about, and around them the heart-rending sobs of disheartened miners, the cries of sorrowing women, and the anguishing appeals of the little children of western Pennsylvania.

THE HOLLOW AND THE SHALLOW CLAIMS

If some definite move is made to improve the present adverse conditions, perchance the hollow claims and the shallow claims of "unparalleled prosperity" will be overlooked. If the administrations show, from this time henceforth, that they have hearts, souls—that they are intent upon doing what is right and just—that they are not laggards in righteous endeavor—they may leave a heritage. But before a single accomplishment shall be placed at their door they must turn the light of righteousness on the sordid and greedy coal operators of western Pennsylvania; the railroads and other interests who are striving to destroy the right of collective bargaining; who have turned their backs on contractual relations and who have tried to make a mockery of American citizenship.

THE UNUSUAL ATTITUDE OF A COURT

When we speak about the violation of the constitutional rights of these people we have in mind the fact that a Federal judge has reached out and for the first time has taken charge of the minerals in the earth that may or may not be mined for interstate commerce, that may never be mined at all—he reaches out the strong arm of the Federal Government, without any testimony being given to show that these miners individually or the miners' organization had interfered in any way or intended to interfere in any way with a pound of coal that had been mined and placed upon the railroad cars for shipment in interstate commerce or interfered in the slightest degree or to any degree with the sale of any of that coal mined and shipped in interstate commerce—without one scintilla of evidence he presumed that probably it would be necessary to guard this coal in the bowels of the earth of Pennsylvania, and which may never find its way into interstate commerce, and issued an injunction depriving the people of the State of Pennsylvania of their constitutional rights. When these things were placed before the President of the United States, and he did not act, to say the least, he was either indifferent or did not care.

VOICE OF THE GREAT HOOVER IS SILENT

Oh, the great Herbert Hoover has been proclaimed all over the world for his humanitarian work; but I wonder why the voice of the great Hoover is silent when his attention is called to the conditions in western Pennsylvania? Where women and children are slowly starving to death for the want of food and clothing because of the violation of a sacred contract which was consummated with his approval. I wonder if it is because of presidential injunction, or is it just presidential yellowness on his part? Let me say if Herbert Hoover expects that he is going to get the support of the coal operators of Pennsylvania for remaining idle and voiceless during this terrible crisis which has been brought about because of a violation by the operators of a contract which Mr. Hoover is responsible for, and does not raise his voice against it, against its violation and the suffering and distress which followed, let me say he may get the support of the coal operators of Pennsylvania, but he must not lose sight of the fact that there are four or five million union men and women in the United States who earn their bread by the sweat of their brow who may have something to say about this thing. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for a very brief question?

Mr. CASEY. Gladly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Has the gentleman told the House anything about the remarkable character of injunctions that have been issued by the courts against the miners in Pennsylvania, which seem to me to exceed any precedent in the history of English or American law?

Mr. CASEY. I just touched on it briefly, Judge. I have copies of several of these outrageous injunctions, which I wish to insert in the RECORD. The first one was issued by Judge Schoonmaker, of the United States district court at Pittsburgh, Pa., and it reads as follows:

THE INFAMOUS INJUNCTIONS

In the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania

Pittsburgh Terminal Coal Corporation, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Pennsylvania, plaintiff, v. United Mine Workers of America, a voluntary association, et al., defendants

DECREE

This cause came on to be heard upon the application of the plaintiff for a preliminary injunction and was heard upon the verified bill of complaint, the affidavits submitted by plaintiff in support thereof, the affidavits submitted by certain defendants in opposition thereto, and the rebuttal affidavits submitted by plaintiff, and was fully argued by counsel for the respective parties. Upon consideration whereof the court finds:

That all of the defendants have been duly served with summons by subpœna and with the order to show cause heretofore issued herein as appears from the record of this cause, except: John L. Lewis, Joe Vujnovic, William J. Patton, Edward Snyder, Frank J. Hayes, Thomas W. Hughes, Fred Gollick, William Hynes, William Cadman, and Stanley Davis.

That the plaintiff is entitled to a preliminary injunction as prayed for (except as modified herein) for the reason that it clearly appears from the specific facts contained in the verified bill of complaint and by the evidence submitted that immediate and irreparable damage and loss will result to plaintiff unless a preliminary injunction be granted, and that for such damage and loss the plaintiff is without any adequate remedy at law.

IT IS THEREFORE ORDERED, ADJUDGED, AND DECREED

That the defendants, the United Mine Workers of America, and all officers, committees, boards, and members thereof; the defendant district No. 5 of the United Mine Workers of America and all officers, committees, boards, and members thereof; the defendant's local unions Nos. 820, 1339, 2363, 2500, 5085, and 5157, and all officers, committees, boards, and members thereof; the defendants, Philip Murray, Thomas Kennedy, P. T. Fagan, William Hargest, John O'Leary, and James Flood, individually and as incumbents of the offices and stations indicated in the bill of complaint, together with all other individual defendants named herein, and all members of said bodies or associations whether served with process or not, and all persons acting in combination or concert with them or who aid, assist, or abet said defendants, or any of them, in the acts hereinafter referred to, are collectively and severally and in their associated and organized capacity, as well as individually, enjoined from doing or attempting to do any of the following acts:

(1) From assaulting, beating, coercing, threatening, intimidating, insulting, molesting, or in any way interfering with plaintiff's employees or their families; or the officers, foremen, agents, or other persons in the employ of plaintiff; or any person transacting any business with, or rendering any service to, or for plaintiff or entering, approaching, or leaving plaintiff's properties, or any of them, in connection with such transaction, business or service; or any person applying for or seeking employment with plaintiff; or any former employee of plaintiff seeking, intending, or desiring to resume employment with plaintiff, including the families of such applicants.

(2) From interfering by violence, threats, intimidation, insult, calling of names or epithets, or in any like manner interfering with any actual or proposed contractual relationship between plaintiff and its employees, or interfering in any way, except as provided in section 6 hereof, with the right of plaintiff and such employees or intending employees or persons desiring or seeking employment to agree unmolested upon such terms of employment as plaintiffs and such persons may regard proper.

(3) From exploding dynamite, powder, or other explosives upon or near any property of plaintiff, or injuring, defacing, destroying, or interfering with any property, real or personal, of plaintiff, or of any of plaintiff's employees or intending employees; or shooting at or toward any property of plaintiff or at or toward any employee of plaintiff or any vehicle or conveyance owned by or engaged in any service for plaintiff; throwing rocks, stones, or other missiles at or toward plaintiff's employees, property, or vehicles or at vehicles or automobiles engaged in any service for plaintiff's benefit.

(4) From obstructing, impeding, hindering, preventing, or interfering with the operation of plaintiff's mines, or any of them, or the doing of any act connected with such operation, or obstructing, impeding, hindering, preventing, or interfering with the production, mining, transportation, or shipment of coal by plaintiff from its mines described in the bill of complaint.

(5) From trespassing upon plaintiff's property, mines, tipples, or cars for any purpose, or upon any other lands, places, highways, or property (except entering voting places, post offices, or physicians' offices), with the intent or purpose of committing any act forbidden by this decree.

(6) From congregating, loitering, parading, or gathering about or near plaintiff's properties or from picketing the same except as follows:

(a) One picket post may be maintained upon or immediately adjacent to each public highway leading to each mine of plaintiff, but not upon its property, and not closer than 100 feet to any building or structure—not including company houses—used by plaintiff as an office or in its operations.

(b) Nor more than three persons at a time shall be stationed at any picket post, and no other person shall be permitted to stand or loiter at any place within 100 feet from the limits of any picket post for any purpose whatsoever.

(c) Each picket post established shall be not to exceed 100 feet in length along the highway and its limits shall be indicated by a sign, flag, or marker.

(d) Relief pickets shall not stay in the vicinity of picket posts when not on duty.

(e) Pickets on duty at their respective posts may peacefully observe, communicate with, and persuade persons but shall not make use of abusive or threatening language. The peaceful persuasion herein referred to is peaceful persuasion directed toward one who is not known to be an employee, in the effort to keep him from becoming an employee, or directed toward one who is an employee, in the effort to induce him to terminate his relation of employment; it does not include talking to any person after having been notified or advised by him of his unwillingness to be talked with, or pursuing, or following any such person for any such purpose. Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to prevent defendants from meeting in ordinary neighborhood or social gatherings or from attending meetings of their unions in their union halls, provided that such gatherings or meetings shall not be conducted with the purpose or effect of violating the provisions or the spirit of this injunction, and the respective officers of such defendant unions as well as the persons taking part in such gatherings or meetings are charged with the responsibility of carrying this provision completely into effect.

(7) From hereafter detaining or occupying any mining house or houses of plaintiff by causing the same to be occupied against plaintiff's will by persons not employed by plaintiff; excepting that this decree shall not affect any cause now instituted and pending in the State courts of Pennsylvania, at the time of the commencement of this action and affecting the possession of such houses.

(8) From disbursing any funds for any further appeal bonds, attorney services, court costs, or otherwise for the purpose of enabling, aiding, encouraging, or procuring any person to occupy against the plaintiff's will any such mining houses of plaintiff; from signing any further appeal bond or depositing, providing, or furnishing security for such appeal bond to prolong or aid in litigation respecting the possession of said houses; but nothing herein shall prevent Oliver K. Eaton and William H. Coleman, or either of them, representing as attorneys and counsel the individual occupants of miners' houses in the appeals in the Superior Court of Pennsylvania.

(9) From interfering with plaintiff in the exercise of any right reserved to it under its leases of said miners' houses to secure repossession of the same and to remove the effects of any occupant thereof; provided that nothing herein contained shall interfere with the individual right of any tenant or tenants of any such house or houses to interpose in any court of competent jurisdiction any legal defense which he may have.

(10) Such defendants as are still occupying plaintiff's houses are enjoined from annoying, disturbing, insulting, interfering with, or threatening the families of plaintiff's employees and from encouraging members of defendant unions from using their occupancy of plaintiff's homes as a means of disturbing, annoying, or interfering with plaintiff's employees in neighboring houses or doing any other kind of injury to plaintiff's employees or property.

(11) This injunction shall become effective upon the plaintiff giving bond conditioned according to law in the sum of $50,000; said bond has this day been filed and approved.

F. P. SCHOONMAKER,
United States District Judge.

Dated at Pittsburgh, Pa., this 11th day of October, 1927.

MINE WORKERS DARE NOT MOVE OR MOTION

Here is an injunction issued by Judge Baker, of the United States district court at Wheeling, W. Va., which practically prohibits the United Mine Workers of America from functioning in any manner whatever.

District Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia (at Wheeling)

West Virginia-Pittsburgh Coal Co. v. John L. Lewis et al.

PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION

This cause came on this 19th day of May, 1925, to be heard upon the bill of complaint and the exhibits filed therewith, the affidavits of George D. Caldwell, Jim Long, Will Harris, William Turner (Nos. 1 and 2), Danilo Ljboper, Charles Wilis, Charlie Matvichuk, George Williams (Nos. 1 and 2), Oscar Maryland, Betroy Mills, Glen Wade, Louis Favali, Dan Johnson, John T. McMahon (Nos. 1 and 2), Charles Carter, Lawrence McMartney, Bert Snyder, Daniel Allman, Ignatz Kafton, Mike MaManus, Joseph J. Kossan, John M. Conner, Harry Sandreth, John Bober, Steve Humon, Paul Doebele, John Owens, and O. J. Keyes, filed by the plaintiff, the application of the plaintiff for the preliminary injunction, the orders herein heretofore made, and other papers herein heretofore filed, the several writs of summons and the returns of the marshal showing service of the same upon the defendants Van A. Bittner, William Roy, Frank Ledvinka, John Cinque, William T. Roberts, and Joseph Angelo, and upon the notice of the application for this preliminary injunction and the marshal's return showing the service of the said notice upon the defendants Van A. Bittner, William Roy, Frank Ledvinka, John Cinque, William T. Roberts, and Joseph Angelo, upon which notice the plaintiff did on the return day present its said application for preliminary injunction, which motion has been since the said return day under consideration by the court, and now comes on for hearing upon the said notice, upon the motion of the defendants to dismiss the bill of complaint, heretofore presented and filed in open court, in person, and by their counsel, Thomas T. Rownsend, John D. Gardner, J. W. Walker, and Wm. L. Bradshaw, and the court having heard the argument of counsel for the plaintiff and of counsel for the said defendants and maturely considered the question arising upon the bill of complaint, the exhibits filed therewith, the affidavits filed in support thereof, and the plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction, doth overrule the defendants' motion to dismiss the bill of complaint and doth find that the facts shown constitute sufficient grounds for the granting of the preliminary injunction prayed for in the bill of complaint, and is of the opinion to grant said preliminary injunction.

The court doth, therefore, adjudge, order, and decree that the defendants Van A. Bittner, a citizen and resident of the State of Pennsylvania, residing at Grafton in said State, individually and as chief representative of the United Mine Workers of America and of the International Union of the United Mine Workers of America; William Roy, a citizen and resident of the State of Ohio, residing in Belmont County in said State, individually and as vice president of district No. 6 of the United Mine Workers of America and of the International Union of the United Mine Workers of America; Frank Ledvinka, a citizen and resident of the State of Ohio, living and residing at Bridgeport in said State, individually and as president of subdistrict No. 5 of district No. 6 of the United Mine Workers of America and of the International Union of the United Mine Workers of America; John Cinque, a citizen and resident of the State of Ohio, residing at Bridgeport in said State individually and as vice president of subdistrict No. 5 of district No. 6 of the United Mine Workers of America and of the International Union of the United Mine Workers of America; William T. Roberts, a citizen and resident of the State of Ohio, residing at Bridgeport in said State, individually and as secretary-treasurer of subdistrict No. 5 of district No. 6 of the United Mine Workers of America and of the International Union of the United Mine Workers of America; and Joseph Angelo, a citizen and resident of the State of Ohio, residing in Belmont County in said State, individually and as official organizer of and for the United Mine Workers of America and of the International Union of the United Mine Workers of America, operating in subdistrict No. 5 of district No. 6 of the United Mine Workers of America, and their committees, agents, servants, confederates, and associates and all persons combining and conspiring with the said defendants, and each and everyone of them, be and they are hereby, enjoined and restrained:

1. From interfering or attempting to interfere with plaintiff's employees for the purpose of unionizing plaintiff's mines without its consent, by representing or causing to be represented to any of plaintiff's employees, or to any person who might become an employee of plaintiff, that such person will suffer or is likely to suffer some loss or trouble in continuing in or entering the employment of plaintiff, by reason of plaintiff not recognizing the union, or because plaintiff runs a nonunion mine;

2. From interfering or attempting to interfere with plaintiff's employees for the purpose of unionizing the mines without the plaintiff's consent, and in aid of such purpose knowingly and willfully bringing about the breaking by plaintiff's employees of contracts of service known at the time to exist with plaintiff's present and future employees;

3. From knowingly and willfully enticing plaintiff's employees, present and future, to leave plaintiff's service on the ground that the plaintiff does not recognize the United Mine Workers of America or runs a nonunion mine;

4. From interfering or attempting to interfere with plaintiff's employees so as to knowingly and willfully bring about the breaking by plaintiff's employees, present and future, of their contracts of service known to the defendants to exist, and especially from knowingly and willfully enticing such employees, present and future, to leave plaintiff's service without plaintiff's consent;

5. From trespassing or entering upon the grounds and premises of plaintiff or its mines for the purpose of interfering therewith or hindering or obstructing its business, or with the purpose of compelling or inducing, by threats, intimidation, violence, or abusive language, or persuasion, any of plaintiff's employees to refuse or fail to perform their duties as such;

6. From compelling or inducing or attempting to compel or induce, by threats, intimidation, or abusive or violent language, any of plaintiff's employees to leave its service, or fail or refuse to perform their duties as such employees, or compelling or attempting to compel by like means any person desiring to seek employment in plaintiff's mines and works from so accepting employment therein;

7. From picketing the streets, roads, or other avenues of approach to plaintiff's mines for the purpose of enticing, entreating, persuading, or by any means inducing plaintiff's employees to break their contracts of service known to them at the time to exist; from approaching plaintiff's employees, present or future, at their place of residence or at any other place for the purpose of enticing, entreating, persuading, or by any means inducing employees to break their contracts of service known to them at the time to exist; from advertising meetings or by any means inducing plaintiff's employees to attend meetings at which attempts shall be made, by entreaty, enticement, or persuasion, to induce plaintiff's employees to break their contracts of service then known to them to exist; and from doing the like for the purpose of unionizing plaintiff's mines.

It is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that before this injunction shall be effective the plaintiff shall enter into a bond with security to be approved by the court, in the penalty of $10,000 conditioned to pay any loss or damage which may result to the defendants or any of them from the issuing of this preliminary injunction, if it should be finally determined that the same is improperly issued, or that may be rewarded to them by reason of the granting of said preliminary injunction.

It is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that this preliminary injunction shall be and remain in full force and effect from the filing of the bond above mentioned until the further order of this court.

To the granting of said preliminary injunction the said defendants object.

W. E. BAKER,
United States District Judge.

Dated May 19, 1925.

NONUNION MINERS ISOLATED

Here is another injunction, issued by Judge McClintic, of the United States district court at Charleston, W. Va., the effect of which is to isolate the poor, underpaid, nonunion miners of that field against every effort by the miners' union to help them improve their condition:

District Court of the United States for the Southern District of West Virginia (at Charleston)

Red Jacket Consolidated Coal & Coke Co., a corporation, v. John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers of America, et al.

FINAL DECREE

This cause having been argued by counsel and submitted to the court at a former term, came on to be further heard at this term for final decision.

And the court having maturely considered the evidence and proceedings herein, and the argument of counsel thereon, and being of opinion that certain salient questions of fact are presented upon the record herein, doth find, adjudge, and decree the facts in this cause in respect of such matters as set forth in its written statement thereof marked "Finding of facts," dated the 16th day of October, 1925, entitled in the several suits pending in this court, including this suit, which were consolidated and brought on to be heard together by an order entered therein on the 22d day of May, 1923; which "finding of facts" is hereby filed herein and made part of the record in this cause.

And it appearing that of the defendants named in the plaintiffs' bill of complaint, the defendants above named in the caption of this decree, and each of them, have been duly served with process herein, or have appeared by counsel, and the court being of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to an injunction against said defendants, as hereinafter set forth and awarded, for the reason that unless such injunction be granted said defendants will continue their unlawful acts and practices set forth in said "finding of facts," and appearing from the evidence herein, and that damage to plaintiffs' property, business, and rights, or destruction thereof, will occur, and that threats, intimidation, and violence against plaintiffs' employees will continue, with the result that the mines of the plaintiffs will be closed or the operation thereof interfered with and plaintiffs prevented from producing and shipping coal from said mines in interstate trade and commerce, and their employees who desire to work in and about said mines thrown out of employment, by reason whereof the plaintiffs, and each of them, will suffer irreparable injury, loss, and damage to their property, business, and rights, and the rights of their said employees will also be violated, all contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States and of the antitrust acts of Congress referred to in said "finding of facts," for none of which there is any adequate remedy at law:

Therefore, for the reasons aforesaid, and in accordance with the findings of this court set forth in said "finding of facts," it is adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the said defendants hereinabove named in the caption of this decree, and each and all of them, including all members of said international organization, United Mine Workers of America, and of districts Nos. 17 and 29 thereof, and of all subdivisions and local organizations of said district, their officers, agents, servants, employees, and attorneys, and those in active concert or participating with them, be, and they are hereby, inhibited, restrained, and enjoined:

(1) From interfering with the employees of the plaintiffs or with men seeking employment at their mines, by menaces, threats, violence, or injury to them, their persons, families, or property, or abusing them or their families, or by doing them violence in any way or manner whatsoever, or by doing any other act or thing that will interfere with the right of such employees and those seeking employment, to work upon such terms as to them seem proper, unmolested, and from in any manner injuring or destroying the properties of the plaintiffs, or either of them, or from counseling or advising that these plaintiffs should in any way or manner be injured in the conduct and management of their business and in the enjoyment of their property and property rights.

(2) From trespassing upon the properties of the plaintiffs, or either of them, or by themselves, or in cooperation with others, from inciting, inducing, or persuading the employees of the plaintiffs to break their contract of employment with the plaintiffs.

(3) From aiding or assisting any other person or persons to commit or attempt to commit any of the acts herein enjoined.

(4) From aiding or abetting any person or persons to occupy or hold without right, any house or houses or other property of the plaintiffs, or any of them, by sending money or other assistance to be used by such persons in furtherance of such unlawful occupancy or holding.

And it is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the plaintiffs recover of and from said defendants their proper costs by them expended in the prosecution of this suit to be taxed by the clerk of this court.

GEORGE W. MCCLINTIC,
District Judge.

Dated October 16, 1925.

A SWEEPING DECREE OF THE COURT

Here is a sweeping injunction that was issued by Judge Hough, of the United States district court at Steubenville, Ohio:

In the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio, Eastern Division

Clarkson Coal Mining Co. et al., plaintiffs, v. United Mine Workers of America et al., defendants

PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION

This cause came on to be heard upon the applications of the plaintiffs and of the intervenor, the New Pocock Coal Co., for a preliminary injunction, and was heard upon the bill of complaint and the intervening bill of complaint and the evidence and was argued by counsel; upon consideration whereof the court finds:

That all the defendants herein, save John L. Lewis, Philip Murray, and Thomas Kennedy, as individuals have either been served with process or have entered their appearance herein, and the court further finds that plaintiffs and intervenor are entitled to a preliminary injunction as prayed for, for the reason that it clearly appears from specific acts shown by the verified bill and the evidence that immediate and irreparable loss or damage to property rights will result to plaintiffs and intervenor unless a preliminary injunction is granted.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that, save as to John L. Lewis, Philip Murray, and Thomas Kennedy as individuals, but including them as officers and agents of said United Mine Workers of America, the defendants herein and the officers, agents, and associates of said defendants, or any of them, and all persons in concert or participating with said defendants, and all persons to whom notice of this order shall come, be, and they are, severally and collectively hereby enjoined and restrained as follows:

1. From interfering with, obstructing, or preventing in any way, or attempting so to do, the carrying on of the business of the plaintiffs, or any of them, and of said intervenor, and from interfering with, obstructing, or preventing, or attempting so to do, the operation of each and all coal mines of the plaintiffs and the intervenor within the State of Ohio, including specifically the operation by the Clarkson Coal Mining Co. of its three coal mines located, respectively, at or near St. Clairsville and Fairpoint, in Belmont County, and at Dun Glen, in Belmont and Jefferson Counties; the operation by the Monroe Coal Co. of the mine known as the Webb mine, situated near Shadyside, in Belmont County; the operation of the Boomer Coal & Coke Co. of the Rose mine, situated near Cadiz, in Harrison County; the operation by the Atlantic Construction Co. of the Florence mine, situated near Martins Ferry, in Belmont County; and the operation by the New Pocock Coal Co. of its Maple Leaf mine, situated near the village of Newport, Tuscarawas County, Ohio; its Cambridge No. 1 mine, situated at or near the village of Blue Bell, Guernsey County, Ohio; its Pocock No. 8 mine, situated at or near the village of Navarre, Stark County, Ohio; and its Belmont mine, situated at or near the village of Flushing, Belmont County, Ohio.

2. From destroying or damaging, or attempting to destroy or damage, the plant, buildings, equipment, or property at or near any of said mines.

3. From exploding or causing to be exploded any dynamite or other explosives anywhere on or about or in the neighborhood of any of said mines or on or near any highway used by employees of any of the plaintiffs or said intervenor, or others going to or from any of said mines, and from shooting at or toward any houses or buildings or structures at or in the vicinity of said mines, or at or toward any of the plaintiffs' agents, officers, or employees, or at or toward any person having any contact with any of the plaintiffs or with said intervenor or employees of any such contractor.

4. From trespassing upon or unlawfully entering into or upon any of said mines or any of the lands or buildings owned, leased, or controlled by any of the plaintiffs or said intervenor, and from entering upon or trespassing upon any lands near or in the vicinity of any of said mines, or the doing of anything designed or intended to interfere in any way with plaintiffs or intervenor or any of them, or the plaintiffs' or intervenor's employees, or with persons having business with any of them;

5. From doing any act or acts of violence, or making any threats by acts or words to, or in the hearing or presence of the employees, or those desirous of or to become employees of any of the plaintiffs or of intervenor, or to or in the hearing of or presence of contractors or employees of contractors with whom plaintiffs or intervenor, or any of them, have contracts, to the effect that such persons or members of their families will be, or may be assaulted, killed, or injured in any manner, or that their property will be injured or destroyed;

6. From displaying any signs or banners containing any words or language designed to intimidate or insult employees or prospective employees of plaintiffs or intervenor, who are at said mines or are desirous to go to said mines, or any of them, or contractors or persons having business at said mines, on the premises of the plaintiffs or said intervenor, or on any highway or railroad station within a radius of 10 miles from any of said mines. The prohibition applies to the display of signs now or hereafter on property owned or leased by the defendants, as well as to all other places within the territory described. The words "scab," "rat," "yellow dog," and like terms, and profane or obscene words or terms shall not be used in a menacing, threatening, or insulting manner, or be applied to plaintiffs' or intervenor's officers, agents, or employees;

7. From interfering in any way with the plaintiffs and intervenor or any of them or their agents in the making or carrying out of any contract of employment which any of them may desire to make, or has made, with any person; and from attempting to coerce or induce any such employee to break any such contract of employment, and from attempting to coerce or induce any such employee to become a party to any plan or conspiracy of any nature designed or tending to force plaintiffs or intervenor or any of them to enter into a contract with the United Mine Workers of America or any constituent union, or to force the plaintiffs and intervenor or any of them to operate their said mines or any of them upon the "closed union shop basis" against their will;

No groups or crowds shall be permitted for the purpose of communicating with or persuading persons seeking employment from accepting employment or contracting for employment with the plaintiffs and intervenor or any of them. Persuasion in the presence of three or more persons congregated with the persuader is not peaceful persuasion and is hereby prohibited;

8. From blockading any of the public highways leading to said mines of the plaintiffs or intervenor or any of them, and from interfering in any way with the free use of said highways by any and all persons having business with plaintiffs and intervenor or any of them;

9. From gathering or loitering in groups or crowds about or near the mines or property owned or leased by any plaintiff, or by intervenor, or upon, along, or about any public road, railroad, railroad station, or train, or place of any kind near any of said mines or property, or used by plaintiffs' or intervenor's agents or employees, or by persons seeking or having employment contracts with any plaintiff or with intervenor, or used by such contractors, agents, or employees in going to and from work wherever located, or used by plaintiffs or intervenor or any of them for the transportation of men under contract who work for them or any of them, for the actual or apparent purpose of intimidating or creating fear in the minds of any such person or persons, or for the purpose of coercing or persuading or attempting to coerce or persuade any person to break or not to make any employment contract with any plaintiff or with intervenor, or from working with any contractor or plaintiff or intervenor.

Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to prevent defendants from meeting in ordinary neighborhood or social gatherings or from attending meetings of their unions in their union halls, provided that such gatherings or meetings shall not be conducted with the purpose or effect of violating the provisions or the spirit of this injunction, and the respective officers of such defendant unions as well as the person taking part in such gatherings or meetings are charged with the responsibility of carrying this provision completely into effect;

10. From picketing except as herein specifically permitted:

(a) Picket posts may be maintained upon or immediately adjacent to each public highway leading to the mines of plaintiffs or intervenor, but not upon their property, and such posts in no event shall be closer together than 700 yards, nor shall any picket post be located closer than 100 feet from any building or structure owned or leased by plaintiffs or intervenor.

(b) Not more than three persons at a time shall be stationed at any picket post, and no other person shall be permitted to stand or loiter at any place within 100 feet from the limits of any picket post for any purpose whatsoever;

(c) Each picket post established shall be not to exceed 100 feet in length along the highway, and its limits shall be indicated by a sign, flag, or marker;

(d) A list containing the names of the picket details as soon as chosen will be delivered to the United States marshal, southern district of Ohio, accompanied by a rough plat or plats showing the designation and location of each picket post. The list shall also show the assignment and post location of each individual picket. In case of change of picket personnel or location of picket posts at any time, the fact of such change will be reported to said United States marshal at the time made. The president of subdistrict No. 5 is charged with the duty and responsibility of seeing that the information and reports herein mentioned are promptly given to the United States marshal;

(e) Each picket shall be a citizen of the United States and shall be able to speak the English language;

(f) Relief pickets shall not stay in the vicinity of picket posts when not on duty;

(g) Pickets on duty at their respective posts may peacefully observe, communicate with, and persuade persons, but shall not make use of abusive or threatening language. The peaceful persuasion herein referred to is peaceful persuasion directed toward one who is not known to be an employee in the effort to keep him from becoming an employee, or directed toward one who is an employee in the effort to induce him to terminate his relation of employment upon the expiration of any employment contract he may be under, but does not include peacefully persuading one to break an existing employment contract;

(h) The erection or maintenance of tents or other places for the assembly of persons belonging to defendants' union or their sympathizers (other than tents used solely for pickets) within 100 yards of plaintiffs' properties, or within 100 yards of any picketed highway, is hereby restrained;

11. From the doing of any act or acts whatsoever in the furtherance of any combination or conspiracy heretofore or hereafter formed for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or interfering with plaintiff or intervenor or any of them in the mining, shipping, and sale of coal from said mines or any of them;

12. It is further ordered that the marshal cause this preliminary injunction to be published in a newspaper of general circulation in each of the following counties of Ohio, to wit: Belmont, Harrison, Jefferson, Tuscarawas, Stark, and Guernsey, for at least one issue, and that he cause this order, together with a certificate of authenticity of the clerk of this court, to be printed in the English, Italian, and Polish languages and to be posted in at least 25 conspicuous places in each of said counties, save Stark and Tuscarawas, adjacent to the aforesaid mines and elsewhere, and that the clerk of this court issue to the marshal of the northern district of Ohio 50 of said printed and certified orders to be by him posted in conspicuous places in the counties of Stark and Tuscarawas adjacent to the said mines of intervenor, and elsewhere; and all persons are forbidden under the penalty of contempt of this court from destroying, defacing, or mutilating any such poster wherever the same is being lawfully displayed;

13. The marshal for the southern district of Ohio is directed to see that this injunction is enforced within the limits of said district, and to arrest and cause to be arrested any person or persons caught in the act of disobeying any of the provisions of this injunction, and to bring such person or persons forthwith before the United States commissioner or the court, and to report to the court each such other acts of disobedience of this order as may otherwise come to his attention. The marshal is authorized and directed to call to his assistance such persons, either as deputy marshals or otherwise, with compensation allowed by law, as he may deem necessary and is empowered by law to do, for the purpose of securing early and prompt obedience to the provisions hereof within his jurisdiction, and for that purpose the marshal with such assistants as he shall deem necessary and so appoint, shall attend the premises of plaintiffs and intervenor within his jurisdiction, from time to time, and especially at such times as plaintiffs or intervenor shall be ready to engage in mining operations in said respective mines; and said marshal is authorized to make service of copies of this order upon any and all persons within his jurisdiction who may be in or about said mines, or in the vicinity thereof, whether or not named as defendants herein;

14. The court reserves the right to modify this preliminary injunction at any time on its own motion and without hearing if the court shall deem it necessary so to do to make the same more effective and to bring about the purpose for which the same is now issued;

15. This injunction shall become effective as to the plaintiffs upon their giving bond conditioned according to law in the sum of $40,000, and it shall become effective as to the intervener upon its giving a like bond in the sum of $15,000.

LITTLE JUDGES JOIN IN

Not only have the Federal courts thus used their vast power to break the miners' union, destroy the rights of the miners, and prohibit them from securing decent American wages, but State courts, also, are issuing injunctions for the same purpose. I call special attention to an injunction issued by Judge Langham, of the court of common pleas for Indiana County, Pa. And I call your attention, also, to the fact that Judge Langham is the owner of coal lands in the very county in which his injunction is in effect. His injunction reads as follows:

OPERATORS ARE RUTHLESS

What is the attitude assumed by the operators toward a settlement?

Starting this conflict by brazenly repudiating a solemn agreement, they have continued this attitude of rule or ruin to this very day.

When Secretary of Labor James J. Davis, one of the original negotiators of the Jacksonville agreement, called a "peace meeting" of operators and miners, all the big companies repulsed him with effrontery.

The hard-boiled attitude of a small, but dominating, group of operators is thus solely responsible for the failure of this peace meeting.

It should not be forgotten that the principal of these corporations which thus flouted the President of the United States by ignoring the request of his Cabinet member and authorized spokesman was the Pittsburgh Coal Co.

STRIVING TO OBTAIN SUBMISSION BY STARVATION

This reduces the conflict to a test of endurance, with all the resources on one side. It is civil war with one side armed. The result is apparently to be determined by the ability of the miners and their wives and children to endure starvation.

This group of mine owners is not only starving their former employees, disrupting the social order of an entire district and breaking every legal and moral law of industrial relation, but they are holding their more humane associates in line under threat of ruin.

Here is what one of them said to the investigator of the Daily News, Mr. Limpus:

HIS HEART BLEEDS FOR THE KIDS

I may be a traitor to my class and I'd lose my job if this were traced to me, but I'm going to tell you the truth about this strike. First of all, my sympathy is with the miners, and I'm ashamed of what I've done to them. I almost wish I'd resigned, but somebody else would have done it if I hadn't.

They've been brutally treated. I know it. Most coal and iron policemen are thugs. I know that. I've used them. I'm ashamed of myself for having done so and for having evicted families. My heart bleeds for the kids. Everybody in the game is losing a lot of money, and a lot of us are damned near bankrupt.

The Pittsburgh Coal and the Terminal companies are the biggest fellows in the field. They're both using unskilled, imported scab labor, and it's mighty expensive. Those scabs can't make decent salaries in the mines. They nearly starve to death. Both companies have coal and iron policemen, and they are the worst in the business. Anyhow, that's my opinion.

DISGUSTED WITH THE WHOLE BUSINESS

I think all evictions are a mistake. It forfeits the support of public opinion. Besides it's wrong. I may bluff, but I'm going to resign before I give orders to kick another family out into the snow. I'm disgusted with the whole damn business.

There you are. Now, if you print it nobody will ever believe that the president of a coal company ever said that, but it's the truth nevertheless.

The futility of the struggle was revealed by President Jones, of the Bertha Coal Co., described by Limpus as "easily the most broad-minded and least bitter of any of the operators interviewed."

This verdict concerning Jones is indorsed by the leaders of the mine workers. According to Limpus, Mr. Jones said:

This strike has already cost the producers of the Pittsburgh district more than $14,000,000. In my opinion, if we had spent $1,500,000 of that in some kind of scientific cooperative marketing we could have paid the Jacksonville scale and all made money.

TRY TO FRIGHTEN CONGRESS

Not content with flouting a member of the President's Cabinet, these operators attempted to influence Congress just prior to the time I made my speech.

The following is a copy of propaganda sent to many Members of Congress at that time:

FEDERAL REGULATION UNDESIRABLE

MONONGAHELA COAL OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION,
Morgantown, W. Va., December 22, 1927.

MY DEAR SIR: In view of the recommendations in the President's message again recommending Federal regulation of the coal industry in times of emergency, and the conference of operators and representatives of the United Mine Workers of America recently called by the Secretary of Labor, James J. Davis, it occurred to me that the correspondence carried on by telegraph between Secretary Davis and the Monongahela Coal Operators' Association might be of some interest and some aid to you if and when it becomes your duty to consider a bill or bills introduced in this Congress for emergency legislation. I attach hereto a mimeograph copy of the telegrams sent to the association through me by Secretary Davis and replies of the association thereto.

The proposition that a great private industry shall be subjected to governmental interference and regulation because the labor union has seen fit to call a strike in that industry and thereby create an emergency over which the operators in the industry have no control and for which they are in no wise responsible, is wholly untenable. Such a program is violative of the constitutional safeguards guaranteeing the right to private property and freedom of contract and would be an unwarranted and dangerous grant of power which could be easily abused, because the term "emergency," like the term "expediency," is very elastic, and it is obviously unsound and unjust to place legislation upon the statute books which would give opportunity to the United Mine Workers of America at any time to bring down upon the operators in the coal industry Federal regulation by the simple expediency of calling a strike and thereby creating an emergency.

This association desires thus early to go upon record as being unalterably opposed to any such program and now here states its desire to be given notice of an opportunity to be heard upon any bills having for their purpose the carrying of such a program into effect.

Yours very truly,

H. D. PAPE, Executive Secretary.

Please note that they have included copies of the telegrams exchanged with the Secretary of Labor, thus brazenly confirming their refusal to confer with him:

[Western Union]

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 9, 1927.

MONONGAHELA COAL OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION,
Morgantown, W. Va.:

You are requested to attend a conference in my office in the Department of Labor, Washington, Tuesday morning, December 13, at 10 o'clock. The attendance will consist only of bituminous operators of western and central Pennsylvania, northern West Virginia and Ohio, and representatives of the United Mine Workers. The meeting will be for frank discussion of problems affecting the mining industry with the object of bringing about, if possible, a satisfactory and peaceful situation. The conference is called with the knowledge of the President. Very important your company be represented.

JAMES J. DAVIS, Secretary of Labor.

[Western Union]

OPERATORS NOT INTERESTED

DECEMBER 11, 1927.

Hon. JAMES J. DAVIS,
Secretary of Labor, Washington, D. C.:

Acknowledging receipt of your telegram inviting the Monongahela Coal Operators' Association to attend a conference having for its purpose "a frank discussion of problems affecting the mining industry with the object of bringing about, if possible, a satisfactory and peaceful situation" we beg to advise that all of the operators in this association are now and for several years past have been operating their mines open shop. All of them have been operating full time and are now operating as continuously as the conditions of the market will permit in a peaceful manner and without friction or trouble of any kind as between the respective companies and their employees. There is no strike in any mine over which this association has jurisdiction. There is no connection, contractural or otherwise, between the operators of this association and the United Mine Workers of America. Therefore the operators of this association would not be interested in or affected by labor problems which may be brought before the proposed conference. For the foregoing reasons your invitation is respectfully declined.

MONONGAHELA COAL OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION,
D. H. PAPE, Executive Secretary.

[Western Union]

SECRETARY DAVIS DISAPPOINTED

WASHINGTON, D. C.

D. H. PAPE,
Monongahela Coal Operators' Association,
Morgantown, W. Va.:

Deeply regret your decision not to attend conference called by me and ask that you reconsider the subject for consideration is far broader than any immediate wage question. As said in my previous telegram, this conference is for frank and free discussion of all questions at issue. The public is now aware of overproduction, overdevelopment, the vast waste of our natural resources and hopes for some move toward permanent stabilization of the industry, to guarantee steady supplies of coal with fair profit to the operator and steady employment at fair wages to the miner. It is a great mistake to assume this conference is called in the interest of labor only. I personally and representatives of the Department of Labor have discussed the matter with more operators than miners. All previous conferences attended by miners could also have been attended by operators had they so desired. Nothing is ever lost by conference and with many operators losing money and thousands of miners out of work the public has become very much interested. Even if the mines be more or less fully manned, as stated, does this guarantee the industry a future free from the same grievances and the same unsettlement and unemployment as now exist. The present time seems to me the more appropriate for conference because the existing supply of coal will permit discussion without passion or prejudice on behalf of the public and the thousands of miners unemployed and in the interests of the industry itself. I would strongly urge you to be present for full consideration of the problem in its broad humanitarian as well as economic aspects.

JAMES J. DAVIS, Secretary of Labor.

[Western Union]

DECEMBER 13, 1927.

MINES ARE FULLY MANNED, BUT HOW?

Hon. JAMES J. DAVIS,
Secretary of Labor, Washington, D. C.

Your telegram December 12 received 10 p. m. same day. Beg to advise that for reasons stated in previous telegram to you this association is unwilling to participate in coal conference. Members of this association are willing to participate in any conference which may be called to discuss problems relating to the overproduction, conservation, and marketing of coal, or any other economic problems affecting the bituminous industry, in an effort to stabilize the industry and promote the public interest provided coal operators and associations representing the bituminous industry in the various coal producing sections of the United States are invited to be present. The members of this association can not understand how a conference participated in by the United Mine Workers of America, which does not represent labor in this field, and only operators from Ohio, Pennsylvania, and northern West Virginia, representing but a small part of the bituminous industry, can possibly solve any of the economic problems referred to in your telegram. We beg to assure you that our mines are not more or less fully manned, but are overmanned, in that there are more miners in this region than the mines can employ. There are no labor grievances and neither is there any unsettlement or unemployment in the mines operated by members of this association or in this field which can be settled in any conference with the United Mine Workers of America.

MONONGAHELA COAL OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION,
D. H. PAPE, Executive Secretary.

WOMEN AND CHILDREN THE FIRST CONSIDERATION

That is the attitude of these cruel, brutal operators in reply to the suggestion that an armistice be declared, where both sides could sit down together and discuss the situation in a proper manner to see if some relief could not be had to relieve the suffering and distress of those innocent women and children in the western part of Pennsylvania.

Are we, as the representatives of the people of this great Nation, going to sit supinely by with that defiance thrown into our teeth and say that there is no chance to even discuss these relations by corporations that have violated their solemn contracts with the miners' union and forced upon these people this terrible condition that we have there? I have some more statements that I will read to you. I am trying to give you the atmosphere that you are about to approach.

WILL NOT YIELD TO HUMANITY

Here is what they say.

On February 4, 1928, in the issue of the Sun-Telegraph, published in Pittsburgh, Pa., a proposal for an armistice was made by Fannie Hurst. I quote from that paper:

Fannie Hurst's proposal in the Sun-Telegraph Thursday that an armistice be declared in the coal strike and the miners return to work, pending final settlement of the questions at issue, was laid before the union miners' chieftain and before the two largest operators, and this is what they said:

John L. Lewis, international president of the Mine Workers of America: "We are willing to consider an armistice. I can make no suggestion as to what its terms might be until negotiations have been opened. The thing to do is to open negotiations. We have always been and are now willing to meet the operators in a conference."

THE OLD, OLD STORY

C. E. Lesher, vice president of the Pittsburgh Coal Co.: "We indicated our position when we refused to attend the conference called by Secretary of Labor Davis, and it has not changed. We are not interested in the proposal of an armistice, because we do not recognize the existence of a war. We will not meet the union's representatives, because we have nothing to discuss with them."

Horace F. Baker, president of the Pittsburgh Terminal Corporation: "The time for compromise has passed. We have won the fight. To talk of a truce now is like raising a squawk after the battle is over. As I see it, there is no alternative for the strikers but to continue idle or return to work on our terms."

STRIKE BREAKER INEFFICIENT

Just a word more as to the suicidal nature of this conflict.

Here are some figures which completely explode the excuse of the operators as to the labor cost in unionized American mines:

The selling cost of coal, f. o. b. at the mines, under the Jacksonville scale was from $1.80 to $2.10 per ton.

German brown coal of a very inferior quality cost $3.75.

British, French, Belgian, and German coal of the better grades cost from $4 to $4.50 per ton, f. o. b. mines.

Here is a statement by Vice President Phil Murray, acknowledged to be one of the best-informed men in the coal industry in the United States:

The average production costs in western Pennsylvania during the years 1924, 1925, and 1926, at coal mines operating on the basis of the Jacksonville agreement, was $1.89 per ton.

The Pittsburgh Coal Co., as I have already stated, abrogated its contract August 10, 1925. Statements coming from the company since this abrogation were made public early in March, 1926 and 1927. These statements show that the cost of production operating on the basis of a $6 per day wage rate was $3.78 per ton.

THE COMPANY LOSSES ENORMOUS

It is conservatively estimated that this company's losses for the first 15 months that it fought the union amounted to about $11,000,000. This company has failed to pay dividends on its preferred stock since the latter part of 1925, or since its abrogation of contract. This is the first time in the history of the Pittsburgh Coal Co. that it passed up preferred dividends.

The company's mining equipment manned with efficient union miners, in western Pennsylvania, is capable of yielding an annual production of 22,000,000 tons. During the postwar period its production exceeded this amount. It has been conducting its strike-breaking campaign in western Pennsylvania for two and one-half years, the net result of its effort being a production figure of approximately 24 per cent of normal.

* * * * * * *

The next largest commercial coal producer in the Pittsburgh area is the Pittsburgh Terminal Coal Corporation. It respected the terms of its contract until its legal expiration, March 31, 1927. During the year 1926 it operated its six mines in western Pennsylvania steady and yielded a return of $378,000 to its stockholders after interest on bonded debt, taxes, insurance, etc., had been paid off. The production costs of this company for the year 1926, when it paid the Jacksonville agreement, was $1.86 per ton. Since April 1 it has operated nonunion and has inflicted three separate reductions on its employees. The last wage reduction was put into effect early in December, 1927. This company has suffered heavy losses in its effort to destroy the mine workers' organization and degrade wages. In fact, its first quarterly statement after starting on a nonunion basis, or for the months of April, May, and June, 1927, showed the company's net operating loss to be something in excess of $200,000. During the months of January, February, and March, 1927, this company paid the Jacksonville wage rate and netted a return of $77,000 after paying insurance, interest, taxes, etc.

The Bethlehem Mines Corporation abrogated its contract with the union in July, 1925. Its mines are located in western Pennsylvania and northern West Virginia. I have been unable to ascertain the production costs of this corporation because it is a subsidiary of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation and it has not been possible to secure any public record of the losses of the coal division of this corporation since it broke faith with the United Mine Workers of America. I know that they must be exceptionally heavy.

SHOOT UP PUBLIC SCHOOL

Here are some further facts:

The shooting affray in the Curry strike zone that shocked the country yesterday is the natural consequence of official incompetency that permits the ruthless rule of coal and iron police in western Pennsylvania.

Sheriff Braun very properly took charge of the riot district yesterday after a rain of bullets had been pumped into the strikers' barracks and a public school closed to save children from being shot by snipers.

Maybe Governor Fisher will be spurred to take some decisive action now.

To preserve order and protect the public safety is the fundamental function of government.

Those are the kind of things that are happening in western Pennsylvania, where, under the law of the State parents are compelled to send their children to school, and while those children are in attendance, in compliance with the law, these gunmen and thugs who have been imported from the scums of the earth, armed with authority of the State, come along and shoot into the barracks of the miners and shoot into the public schools to such an extent that the schools have to be closed to save the lives of the little children. Oh, Pennsylvania, what shame!

PENNSYLVANIA GREATLY ADMIRED

Let my position be understood. I love Pennsylvania. Its hills, valleys, dales, mountains; its great industries; its great educational institutions; its patriotism and its general and uniform greatness are the source of never-ending admiration.

Its warriors of every war and its men of peace have the highest place in my regard, but I can not remain silent when I see men and corporations employing questionable methods in order to sully its fair name. I can not remain silent when I see women whose hearts are golden suffer as my mother once suffered. I can not remain silent when I see stalwart men grieved and despondent, wondering how much longer such unjust restrictions shall be imposed; wondering, perchance, during the despondent moment, if life was worth the while. What would Benjamin Franklin, Robert Morris, and the other seven signers of the Declaration of Independence say if they returned to their revered State and found things as I have found them in western Pennsylvania? Would they not come to you, as they appeared before the Continental Congress, and plead, as I have pleaded, more eloquently I know, for a return of justice to their unhappy sons; and they would ask that the coal operators, the railroad managers, and the other interfering interests be rebuked by this Congress, like no aggregation of unprincipled men had ever been rebuked before.

SERIOUS CHARGES AGAINST A GOVERNOR

The charges made against the Pennsylvania Governor are serious ones, and they are all the more serious because they are made by men who love Pennsylvania just as much as he loves it. He is charged with being a party in interest, due to the fact that he is said to be a director and chief counsel for a mine company which is a subsidiary of the New York Central. And this railway, according to the information in my presence, is engaged in the debased, damnable, and un-American work of endeavoring to destroy the principle of contractural relations, and in the effort it has fallen from its high estate into the muck of trickery and deceit.

I do not desire to be misunderstood. I believe capital has its rights; that it has now and always will have a place in our economic and industrial life. But capital must be fair, it must be just, and it must treat its employees as men should be treated—with confidence and consideration. Labor asks the opportunity to share devotion to this high purpose through the only channel that makes cooperation possible—the trade union. Labor's cause is now plainly seen by all men to have what, by implication, it had from the very beginning—a positive as well as a negative purpose. Its aim is not merely to repel opposition, to vindicate public faith, to clip the wings of capital, and to frustrate the designs of what the railroads and the bituminous operators call the avowed policy—the establishment of company unions.

MUSEUM THE PLACE FOR ANCIENT METHODS

Labor recognizes that the old, coercive, and intimidative machinery, however, worked, like chain armor and horse cars, had its day, and that such machinery must take its place among the things one usually views in museums. Labor is determined to provide against the horrors which are now scourging manhood and womanhood in western Pennsylvania, not merely by repression and industrial warfare but by the continuation of collective bargaining and the corporative judgment, the sense of common interests and common duties, the reconciling of the warring industrial interests, and, if need be, the restraining and constraining of our whole industrial family.

It is necessary to thunder with indignation at the sight of harrowing scenes, and it is equally necessary for a note of warning to be sounded when corporations, such as the New York Central, the Pennsylvania Railroad, and other railways, keep stepping outside of their own field of endeavor and interfere with the peace, the prosperity, and the progress of other industries. They pursued such a course once before and were called to account before the bar of public opinion.

The interference in the anthracite coal fields only a few years ago has not been forgotten, and the effort to destroy the United Mine Workers in that region is still fresh in mind. Their apparent purpose was then, the same as it is now in western Pennsylvania, to keep down wages so that high freight rates can be charged.

RAILROADS WARNED TO BE CAREFUL

It will be recalled how the railroads interfered in Pennsylvania politics. They had no scruples about dealing with the gang in whatever way it suggested. Their representatives were everywhere. The mighty railroad hand was raised against every aspiring man who did not think in railway terms and meekly follow the railroad executives' suggestions.

These same executives were so busy attending to everyone's affairs but their own when the World War happened along, so much so that they fell flat. Their rolling stock became impaired and the Government, fearing a general breakdown, interposed and assumed charge. It will be recalled how these same railroad executives came to Congress and cried out in distressful lamentations that if the railroads were given back to the original owners they would be good; that they would attend to their own business and leave other industries and politics alone. Congress listened to their plea and returned the railroads to their owners.

For four or five years they did mind their own business, and as a result the railroads prospered. But unfortunately they can not stand prosperity. It goes to their head. Again they are going forth to conquer new industries. This year, perchance, with all the brazen effrontery of yore, they will again be enmeshed in the muck of gang politics.

THE PUBLIC EYE IS OPENED

But I warn them to desist before they go too far. The public eye is opened; the public conscience is awakened and will no longer tolerate unscrupulous methods. The hand that smote them once will smite them again.

It has been said that a cessation of hostilities would be of little advantage to the striking miners, because mills and factories are idle, and there is no demand for bituminous coal. I will admit that there is a lull in industrial activity. The mills and factories of my home city are not working as steadily as they should, and the anthracite mines are working a little better than half time.

But notwithstanding business stagnation, if peace between the bituminous operators and the striking miners were established, a sense of security would prevail; the miner's credit would be reestablished; he could return to his old home; he would be free from persecution; free from the blackjacks of the unscrupulous coal and iron police, and he and his family would be happy and content in their old environments.

THE ADVANTAGES OF INDUSTRIAL PEACE

The miner is a skilled workman. He must know the use of powder; he must know how to direct the course of the air; he must know how to stand props, erect doors, and brattices; he must know how to encounter gas and black damp; he must know how to protect himself and others from falls of coal and rock; he must know how to handle electrically operated boring machines; he must know how to handle the drill; he must know how to move the mine car from place to place; and, above all, he must know the kind of coal he is blasting, or else he will have only trouble for his pains. He must always look for the preservation of safety from his fellow miners, and they, too, look to him for a display of common sense and good judgment in every one of his daily tasks. But notwithstanding the care exercised, death and injury lurks in the darkness.

THE MINERS' PAY ALWAYS INADEQUATE

He could not be over or excessively paid no matter what his daily wage might be; that is my personal belief, and the belief of every man who is acquainted with the dangers and the intricate details of mines and mining. But the highest wage he ever received in the bituminous fields of western Pennsylvania was under the Jacksonville scale. That was a little over $7 per day. But the miner, if he is paid by the day, very seldom works more than three or four days a week. If he is a contract miner, he could report every day, but he has not the assurance of more than a few cars. So, it will be observed, that his monthly wage is never more than $80 to $90 per month. From this rent for his shack, charges for powder, sharpening of tools, and the like must be deducted.

OPERATORS DESIRE A RETURN OF THE OLD SYSTEM

Then why this charge of high wages? I will tell you. It is plain and unmistakable. The operators desire a return of the old days, when the mine boss cracked the whip the mine employee would run. They want the return of the company store. They want a return of the peonage system. They want a return of the old power of voting, when the miners were voted as a unit for a given candidate, no matter what the individual preference might be. They do not want the miner to have the independence or the freedom the United Mine Workers gives him, and they want to keep the miner at the borderland of starvation and in the state of absolute subjugation. Thus, you will observe, the plea of inability to pay is a pretense, a subterfuge, and it is not going to fool anyone. It might be their wish, but a return of the old system will never materialize, because the people of these United States will not stand for it. The miners are striving as well as their limited means will allow to be true Americans. The seed of communism will, I hope, never find root among them, because they are not going to allow themselves to fall prey to the malefactors of the coal industry. And the good and true people of this country are going to see that they win a victory—one that will insure a decent salary; one that will insure good homes; and one that will insure an education for their offsprings.

THE REMARKABLE CONTRAST BETWEEN TWO GOVERNORS

It is apropos at this time to contrast the remarkable difference in the attitude of the Governor of Pennsylvania and the Governor of Ohio. Conditions in Pennsylvania are as I have described them—intolerable, unbearable, and inhumane. Want, cruelty, and the imposition of blackjack police regulations were in evidence everywhere in the mine patches.

Did the governor of that State size up to the occasion? Did he do one single thing to alleviate the sufferings? Did he do one single thing to satisfy the hunger of the men, women, and children? Did he do one single thing to prevent brutal practices of the coal and iron police? As far as I know, he did not. He incased himself in the ignoble shroud of silence—forgetful of duty.

I have been taught that one comes into this world to enjoy what is beautiful and good and to do as one pleases when the things one wants to do are noble, intelligent, and generous. Was he, the governor of a great State, noble or generous in the great emergency?

SOLDIERS ON MISSIONS OF MERCY

How different was the attitude of the Governor of Ohio. It is true shortly after the strike was called he ordered out the militia, not for the purpose of browbeating and blackjacking or evicting the striking miners, but for the purpose of performing missions of mercy.

The Ohio soldiers carried no guns, but instead carried bread and fed the hungry; clothed those who needed raiment; gave shoes to those who needed them; and escorted, when such was necessary, the children back and forth from school. The Ohio soldiers cheered the despondent, spoke kindly to all, and endeavored in every way possible to make the lot of the miner as happy and contented as circumstances would permit.

SOLDIERS HELD IN AFFECTIONATE REGARD

And as a result the Ohio governor and his manly soldiers are held in affectionate regard because they have lived with kindness in their minds and charity in their hearts and, according to history and religion, they are to live as true exponents of the American principle of noble endeavor.

Much has been said about the coal and iron police. I have had many inquiries as to what this institution is or what it represents, who they are, and where they get their authority. I believe this is an opportune time to make reply to these many inquiries. The coal and iron police is a body created by law by the State of Pennsylvania in an act passed by the legislature during the Civil War. Certain men were unable, because of physical disabilities, to go into the active military service during the war between the North and the South. Coal and iron being recognized as very essential in warfare, it was decided to pass a law by the State of Pennsylvania which, under its provisions, would make these men who were unfit for active military service in the field to be able to contribute their share toward the winning of the war.

The State passed what was known as the act creating the coal and iron police, whose duty it was to protect the coal and iron deposits and industries of the State and see that the coal and iron products were carried to their proper destination. Necessarily, under such a situation, great powers were granted to these coal and iron police.

WHAT ARE COAL AND IRON POLICE?

They represent the chief executive of the State and are commissioned by the governor of the State and are responsible to him; but while they are appointed by the governor, from the recommendations made to him by the coal companies, they are in reality governed in their official action by the coal companies upon whose pay roll they are carried and paid from. They have the full authority of the police powers of the State, while they are on the pay rolls of the coal companies and subject to the orders of these coal companies.

THE ARMED THUG AT LARGE

What else do we find? We find that upon the requests of the coal companies in the western part of Pennsylvania, made to the governor for the commissioning of coal and iron police, approximately 4,000 coal and iron police commissions were issued. These men carry with them the badge of authority of the State, a revolver, a riot club, and they are also dressed in officers' uniforms; they represent and speak in the name of the Governor of the great State of Pennsylvania.

We also find that after fighting for over a year and a half trying to get the facts about these gunmen commissioned as coal and iron police, the governor's office the other day admitted every charge that was made against these men and against the institution as an institution. He says the governor's office admits that there are about 4,000 coal and iron policemen appointed by the governor, and upon a check up by his office they find that there are about 2,500 of these men, with all this authority, representing the governor and the State, that can not be found upon the pay rolls of the coal companies of Pennsylvania; an armed mob of thugs and gunmen roaming through the State, unattached and not responsible to anyone.

And unfortunately under the law these men can not be discharged by the governor unless formal charges have been preferred against them and until they are given an opportunity for defense. Just think of it, an army of 2,500 irresponsible gunmen imported from all parts of the United States, and particularly from the slums of the big cities, roving through Pennsylvania, armed with a commission issued by the governor in the name of the State and representing the governor, and the governor does not know where they are or who they are.

DISORDER INEVITABLE

Is it any wonder we are having murder, bloodshed, riot, and everything that may follow in a situation of that kind, when this army of thugs are prowling through the State unattached? It is a serious matter, gentlemen. If they can do this in Pennsylvania, may they not likewise undertake to do the same thing in every other State. If these conditions are permitted to continue what is going to become of the freedom of the people? What is going to become of the Constitution of the United States? What is going to become of our rights and the protection that the Government of the United States has promised to give to each and every one of us?

The amazing brutalities to which the miners and their families are subjected under the system referred to are graphically set forth in sworn statements of many victims and I wish to place in the RECORD a number of these affidavits, which are as follows:

COULD NOT VISIT HER DAUGHTER

On August 2, 1927, I went into the Valley Camp Coal Co.'s office at the Kinloch Mine with Mrs. George Nuttall and Mrs. Margaret Maughan, a Red Cross nurse, to see Mr. Paisley, if he would permit Mrs. Margaret Maughan to take care of her daughter, Mrs. George Nuttall, as she was about to be confined, and Mr. Paisley said that he would not permit Mrs. Margaret Maughan to go into the patch to take care of her daughter, Mrs. George Nuttall. I asked him a few times that from a human right he should permit the mother to take care of her daughter during her sickness, while the mother is a Red Cross nurse, but Mr. Paisley answered that she could not go into the patch, and said that Mr. George Nuttall should have moved, and said that Mrs. George Nuttall didn't get that way overnight. I said to Mr. Paisley that while I was in his office once before on a confinement that we both understood that a doctor and a nurse could get into the patch, and Mr. Paisley answered that there was no such understanding, and I answered that he was not telling the facts and asked Mr. Paisley again to permit Mrs. Margaret Maughan to take care of her daughter, Mrs. George Nuttall, during her confinement, and Mr. Paisley said, "No; she can not go into the patch."

S. INGERSKI.

On this 19th day of October, 1927, personally appeared before me, a notary public in and for the county of Westmoreland, State of Pennsylvania, S. Ingerski, who, being duly sworn, stated that the above affidavit is true and correct to the best of his knowledge and belief.

INDECENCY AND INSULT

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA,

County of Allegheny, ss:

Mrs. Rosa Costa, being duly sworn, says that she is the wife of Tony Costa, and lives in one of the company houses at Mine No. 4, and that this has been her home for four years, her husband during this period and up to April 1, 1927, digging coal for the Pittsburgh Terminal Coal Corporation; that she has five children, four of whom live with her, one a daughter 19 years old.

This affiant says that said company has a large force of coal and iron police stationed at said mine, many of whom are overbearing, offensive, and insulting in their manner; that they do not allow the union miners or members of their families to stand on the highway, but continually order them to move on; that they will not allow any of affiant's relatives, or relatives of other union families to visit them at their homes; that they will not permit the delivery of foods or groceries or other supplies purchased by the affiant or other families of union miners, but require the affiant and union miners and their wives to carry in their own supplies that they have purchased at Horning.

Affiant further says that many of the guards are insulting to the wives of union miners and to the girls of their families; that there is a toilet used by said coal and iron police in the rear of the house in which the affiant lives and about 40 or 50 feet from the rear porch, and that it is a common occasion for the members of the coal and iron police to go to the said outhouse they use about half dressed and use the same without closing its door and in full view of this affiant and members of her family and other families of union miners living near by, exposing their person to public view; that on one occasion one of the coal and iron police saw her at the window and motioned to her, and she came out on the porch and asked what he wanted, and he made an indecent proposal to her, whereupon she turned and went into the house.

This affiant further says that she has disliked to make charges before any magistrate of this conduct referred to, and for that reason has not had said coal and iron police prosecuted.

Affiant further says that the coal and iron police are overbearing in their manner toward members of the families of union miners.

(My commission expires first Monday in January, 1932.)

There are two classes in the private army employed by the operators, the coal and iron police and the deputy sheriffs.

It is against the latter that the keenest resentment is felt.

HIRELINGS OF THE OPERATORS

The coal and iron police are frankly the hirelings of the operators. From long experience the miners know these police are ready to go to any lengths to please their bosses and earn their pay.

But the deputies are theoretically the subordinates of the sheriff, an officer elected by popular vote and intrusted with wide powers and discretion.

In actual practice the deputies are selected by the operators, just the same as the private police. The miners charge they are just as overbearing, just as careless of the rights of ordinary human beings as the companies' hired men.

At Harwich, where the mine is owned by the interests which control the Pittsburgh street railways, complaints were numerous.

DEPUTIES WORSE THAN PRIVATE POLICE

Here the practice of forbidding the miners, then still living in company houses awaiting the decision of the courts in the eviction suits, from visiting among themselves or exercising many of the ordinary privileges of citizens were stated to be enforced with special rigor.

One striker told of being arrested for speaking to a sick friend who died a week later. The miners had to plead for permission to attend the funeral and were forbidden to march to the grave.

Another striker stated he had been arrested when he went to ask the wife of a neighbor to do some washing for his wife, who was expecting a new baby.

Still another said he had been fined $14.60 for trespass because he carried groceries to the house of a relative.

In another case a woman standing by the fence between two lots had been struck on the toes by a deputy and profanely told to "keep in her own back yard."

Six families were evicted at this mine on the very day the American Federation of Labor conference convened in Pittsburgh. The deputies threw the furniture into the street.

MINE BARONS CONTROL SCHOOLS

Another cause of bitter complaint was the treatment of the strikers' children who, it was asserted, were driven off the streets by the deputies.

The school directors are mine officials and many incidents were related of discrimination against the children of miners.

When the chief deputy at this point was interviewed concerning these charges he did not deny them, but deprecated the stories of the strikers, claiming they had been "exaggerated." He admitted that certain families had been forbidden to visit their friends, but justified this on the ground that they were "radicals."

BRUTALITY UNNECESSARY

Another chief deputy, only a few miles away, indignantly denied that there was necessity for such tactics. He contended such practices were deliberate attempts to foment disorder.

Our duties are to prevent unlawful assembly and obstruction of the public highways.

He said.

There should be no difficulty in performing these functions as the miners are anxious to avoid trouble. They are good boys and only ask to be let alone. If the coal and iron bullies would keep their mouths closed and attend to their own business there would be little to do.

He pointed to the fact that his territory had been one of the quiet sectors of the strike area, but said he had been reproached by mine officials for not "bearing down" harder on the miners. One of the complaints was that he "talked pleasantly to them."

Ample proof exists of the truth of the miners' statement that hundreds of arrests have been made on the most trivial charges. Both the deputies and the coal and iron police do not take their victims before the nearest justice of the peace, but draw them all over Allegheny County seeking a justice who will be sure to "stick" them.

ABSURD TACTICS OF POLICE

Some of the cases border on the absurd.

For example: One picket, a Turk, was taken before one of these "hard-boiled" justices of the peace charged with using abusive language.

It happened that he had called, in his native tongue, to a scab who happened to be of his own race:

Hi, buddy, there is a strike on in that mine.

An official interpreter had to be called from Pittsburgh before the local Solomon could be convinced that "buddy" in Turkish was not an opprobious epithet.

At another point a picket was arrested for talking too loud. The operations at this mine had been shifted to keep the scabs from coming close to the picket posts on the public road, but this picket, blessed with an especially powerful voice, had been able to beat that game and project his message to the listening nonunionists. Just how loud an American citizen might speak without fracturing the laws and constitution of Pennsylvania was not definitely determined by the justice of the peace.

The "squire" was doing a land-office business until the number of miners brought before him and the unvarying regularity with which they were found guilty and fined attracted the attention of officers of the United Mine Workers. Since then, about 240 appeals have been taken from his decisions.

We have in Pennsylvania a situation where the courts have declared that when a miner leases a house from a coal company the relation of landlord and tenant does not exist, as it does under the laws of other States, and when these evictions commenced the miners' union undertook to try and test the validity of these leases. They succeeded in getting some of these leases up to the courts; but, finally, along comes this injunction I spoke about a minute ago and enjoins the miners' union, its officials, or anybody connected with it directly or indirectly, from continuing "this conspiracy to prevent men returning to work in the mines" for this particular defendant by either putting up bonds or employing lawyers or contributing in any way toward getting the cases of these poor miners into court; and, of course, their cases can not be reviewed by the courts if they can not get them before the courts.

THE HEARTLESS EVICTIONS

This injunction went so far as to restrain and name the bonding companies that are restrained from putting up bonds in order to get their cases properly before the court—I think the amount of the bond was $700.

Here is a matter for those of you who are lawyers; here is a matter for those of you who have been judges; here is a matter for the great Committee on the Judiciary of this House—to protect the sovereign rights of citizens of the United States, because when a man living in one of these humble company shacks is informed of his eviction, if he does not get out, he and his family are put out on the streets, and if any person goes to his rescue he is enjoined for doing so, and if he did help an unfortunate man he no doubt would be sent to jail for contempt of court. The miners do not have $700. If they had they would not be working in those damnable hell holes in the bowels of the earth.

They can not get into court. They have not the money to put up the bonds, and the court reaches out and forbids the miners' union to put up the bonds so that these men may get their cases into court. It restrains the bonding companies of Pennsylvania from putting up bonds for these miners, because they consider it a part of a conspiracy to keep men from going to work in these mines.

CITIZENS DEPRIVED OF THEIR RIGHTS

This is the situation, my friends, briefly stated. How are the poor miners going to get their cases into court when we find a judge sitting on the bench depriving American citizens of the right to have their cases reviewed by the courts of the land? How long are we going to stand for such damnable injunctions that take from the citizens of the United States the right guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States. Such practices are rightly called government by injunction.

No feature of the strike has aroused more deserved indignation than the manner in which the miners have been thrown out of their homes by the operators.

Almost 10,000 families have been evicted and are being sheltered in flimsy barracks, in abandoned churches, old stores buildings, and in any other place which will afford some semblance of protection from the bitter winter weather of the Pittsburgh district.

I have here a list of barracks erected by the United Mine Workers, which I ask be inserted in the RECORD:

HOUSES STAND EMPTY

The excuse given for the eviction of the miners from the company houses was that the houses were needed for scabs. Yet, in a number of cases, after the miners had been driven out, the places were left vacant, except for those occupied by coal and iron police.

At Lick Run I saw a row of 44 houses with the windows boarded up with scrap lumber.

Right across the road, in flimsy barracks erected by the miners with material furnished by the United Mine Workers were the families that had been evicted.

Some of the families had lived in the company houses for 30 years. Several of the strikers in the barracks first saw the light of day in those abandoned homes.

The barracks are of one thickness of coarse lumber and this has already shrunken so as to leave wide cracks. These are covered with paper to keep out rain, snow, and wind. No appeal to the imagination is necessary to emphasize what this means to women, some in delicate health, and to children during the winter months.

When I visited the Pittsburgh district some of the union miners were still living in company houses pending decision in suits brought by the United Mine Workers.

In many cases they had scabs for next-door neighbors. Under the terms of the injunction issued by Judge Schoonmaker, as construed by the coal and iron police, they were not permitted to resent by word or look the jeers and insults of the mine guards or the scabs.

WANTON CRUELTIES

Their light and water had been cut off. On the ground that it constituted trespassing as defined by the injunction, grocery men, milkmen, and others bringing household supplies were forbidden to enter the company's property.

The miners and their wives had to wait in the public road until the delivery men came by and then carry their purchases to their homes, in some cases over half a mile.

I saw several women climbing hillsides with bags of coal on their heads. In another place a number of strikers were gathered by the roadside guarding bundles which others were carrying away in relays.

In one camp the only source of supply, after the water had been cut off, was a condemned spring. One of the commonest sights was that of boys carrying pails of water for long distances from springs or from the wells of sympathetic home owners.

Not content with this petty persecution the mine companies have resorted to more serious aggression.

TEAR DOWN HOUSES

At Coverdale Mine No. 8, I visited the home of John Usnick, a union miner then living in a company house.

Usnick had been served with an eviction notice and had refused to leave. The company had been restrained from throwing him out by the suits brought by the United Mine Workers.

Without any notice whatever a gang of company workmen was sent to the house and proceeded to erect scaffolding and tear off the roof. When an explanation was demanded Usnick was informed that "necessary repairs" were being made.

Mrs. Usnick was lying ill in an upper bedroom at the time and a block of wood dropped on her shoulder, paralyzing it for several days.

Complaint was made to the county attorney, and the company was informed that they must replace the roof. This was done by tacking on sheets of paper, leaving holes large enough to admit one's hand. Daylight could be seen through scores of cracks.

Heavy rains drenched the entire house. At the time of our visit the wallpaper was falling off, and the floors were still wet and the furniture soaked.

Two other families in this camp were treated in the same manner. When protest was made the company proceeded to camouflage its action by erecting a third story on the houses, but failed to go to the trouble of providing any connection between the upper and the lower floors. The village contains several hundred houses, but these are the only miners' homes with more than two stories.

The influence of the mine companies is being used, according to the strikers, to prevent them from securing employment of any kind.

At Harmanville an officer of the local miners' union informed me that a number of the strikers had secured work at the Duquesne Light Co., a public-service corporation.

All were suddenly fired. When asked for an explanation, the gang bosses said that word had come from the Consumers' Mine Co. that the miners were "undesirable."

PITTSBURGH CITIZENS AROUSED

What about the people of Pittsburgh?

For a long time they failed to realize the misery and actual starvation existing at their very doorsteps. The miners had suffered in grim silence. But finally the suffering spoke for itself. Various organizations and individuals began to investigate.

Among numerous other agencies the Young Women's Bible Class of the Beechview Episcopal Church, located in a prosperous suburb of Pittsburgh, conducted an investigation of its own.

These girls went into the homes of both scabs and strikers. They were so appalled by what they had seen that they immediately wired the senior Senator from New York. His indignation was so aroused that he in the Senate disclosed the facts given to him in a scathing speech in which he declared: "This is not a recital of conditions in Armenia or in some remote part of the earth, but within half a day's journey from the Capitol."

This telegram was as follows:

CONDITIONS ALMOST UNBELIEVABLE

PITTSBURGH, PA., January 3, 1928.

Senator ROYAL S. COPELAND,
Senate Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR COPELAND: Reading your article on the coal situation prompts me to wire first-hand information. The Young Women's Bible Class of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Beechview, Pittsburgh, made investigation on December 2 in mines Nos. 2 and 3 at Castleshannon and mine No. 8 at Coverdale. We found large families of bright children without shoes and stockings and not sufficient food or clothing. Conditions almost unbelievable could exist in America. We found a newborn babe without any clothing, the first one born in the barracks of Coverdale. We immediately opened a receiving station in Beechview, and we were the first organization to extend relief to these destitute women and children in the mines. It seemed the heavens opened, and in less than three weeks we distributed 1,000 pairs of shoes and stockings, 500 well-filled baskets of groceries, and a lovely Christmas treat for 1,200 children. This is to say the sympathy of the people is expressed in greater degree than upon any previous demand. Judging from the quality of all kinds of clothing, the contributors must have sacrificed. We were happy to provide ample clothing even for this very small portion of the area in distress. The use of coal being a public service, surely the Government will come to the rescue of these people, who are honest and industrious and must not be allowed to perish. We are not concerned in the controversy, but from a humanitarian standpoint we are urging you to use all the power at your command. I met you when you spoke in this city at a meeting. The barracks in which they are forced to live you could insert a lead pencil between the boards.

Very sincerely,

IDA L. ALLEN,
Teacher and Treasurer of the Relief Committee.
Mrs. H. G. SCHRAEDER,
Chairman.

STRIKE BREAKERS SUFFER PRIVATIONS

Amazing as this state of affairs must appear to the Members of the House, the most astounding feature is yet to be disclosed.

This is the condition of the scabs who have, in the Pittsburgh Coal Co. and other mines of the Pittsburgh, West Virginia, and Ohio fields, enjoyed for over two years the wage scales and living conditions which one nonunion operator had the impudence to declare, when repulsing the invitation of Secretary of Labor Davis to attend his conference, were in the public interest.

When the citizens of Pittsburgh were brought to realize the emergency existing on their doorsteps, numerous agencies inaugurated investigations in both strikers' barracks and the stockade-guarded shanties of the scabs.

THE CLERGY AROUSED

This movement was led by the united clergymen of the city, supported by a large volunteer committee composed of the heads of practically every welfare organization in Allegheny County.

The Rev. Dr. Samuel H. Goldenson, rabbi of Rodef Shalmon Temple, as chairman of a ministerial committee, issued a call for a meeting to prepare an appeal to the public for funds.

Members of the committee are the Rev. Dr. Ralph B. Urmy, pastor of the Bellevue Methodist Episcopal Church and chairman of the social service commission of the Pittsburgh Council of Churches of Christ; the Rev. L. W. Mason, pastor of the First Unitarian Church; the Rev. Father J. F. R. Corcoran, head of the Catholic charities of the diocese of Pittsburgh; and the Rev. Dr. W. I. Wishart, pastor of the Eighth United Presbyterian Church, North Side, and president of the Pittsburgh Council of Churches of Christ.

Father Corcoran estimated that $5,000 a week would be required for at least three months to save the miners' families from starvation.

OTHER DISTRICTS SUFFER

But what of the other districts? How are the strikers and scabs faring in West Virginia, Ohio, and central Pennsylvania?

Among those attending the conference called by Secretary of Labor Davis were Van A. Bittner, special representative of the United Mine Workers in West Virginia, and Presidents Lee Hall and James Mark, of the Ohio and central Pennsylvania fields, respectively.

These four chieftains told extremely interesting stories of the coal diggers' struggle in their districts.

By far the most important revelation came from northern West Virginia.

BUSINESS MEN CALLING FOR PEACE

Practically every business and professional man in 13 counties, comprising the entire coal-producing area of the State, has signed a petition calling for peace.

This petition is a most extraordinary document. After reciting that the strike has lasted for three years and that all attempts at a settlement have failed, it declares:

Three years of low wages have demonstrated that prosperity and happiness and contentment can only come to the mine fields of northern West Virginia through a rehabilitation of higher wages, better working conditions, and more freedom in the mining camps.

We believe that this can be brought about only through proper negotiations between the coal operators and the United Mine Workers of America.

The petition is addressed to Governor Howard M. Gore, United States Senators GUY D. GOFF and M. M. NEELY, all of West Virginia, and Secretary of Labor James J. Davis.

These distinguished gentlemen are urged to "use all the influence they possess to bring the operators and miners together for the purpose of negotiating a wage scale and ending the strike, in order that our business may be prosperous and happiness may again prevail."

ALL CLASSES PROTEST

The signers of the petition include sheriffs, mayors, and city councilmen, county attorneys, clergymen of every denomination, bankers and representatives of every line of commerce and industry. About 22 cities and towns are included.

Not content with signing as individuals, the members of the city council of Clarksburg, the fourth largest city in the State and by far the largest in the strike area, adopted an official resolution, declaring that "untold harm had resulted from the strike to inhabitants of the community."

The members of the Ministerial Association of Clarksburg also signed as individuals, and then adopted a resolution expressing the same sentiments on behalf of the association.

The conditions in northern West Virginia were described by Van Bittner.

HOW FARES WEST VIRGINIA?

There is no business in our territory and has been none since the beginning of the strike. The situation is one which residents in more fortunate communities would describe as "impossible."

Not a nickel of the money paid in wages to the scabs is spent in the cities and towns.

The camps are under martial law, administered by the mine guards. The coal properties are surrounded by stockades, flooded with electric lights and patroled by armed gunmen. No one, not even the scabs, is allowed to enter or leave the camps without a pass.

In spite of this situation only 1 out of 10 has been starved and terrorized into returning to work.

The complement of all mines, working full force, is about 20,000. We have 14,000 on strike, with 4,000 families in barracks.

The scabs, mostly southern negroes, are being imported by the carload to take the places of other scabs who escape from the prison camps.

It is estimated that 200,000 have been brought in, yet the largest force at work at one time was about 13,000.

The situation in Ohio and central Pennsylvania was described by Presidents Lee Hall and James Mark.

The Ohio operators are employing mine guards of the usual type. In some mines they outnumber the scabs who are at work. The attitude of the State authorities has been much fairer than in Pennsylvania.

OHIO INJUNCTION-RIDDEN, TOO

The corner stone of the union-busting program in Ohio, as elsewhere, is the injunction issued on behalf of the operators.

Eighteen local and one Federal injunction have been granted.

According to President Hall, only four "open-shop" mines are attempting to operate with scabs, the remainder being closed down.

The Goodyear Rubber Co. tried to operate its large mine on a nonunion basis, but failed to succeed. A number of mines are paying the union scale, selling their coal and apparently prospering.

FIGHT COSTLY TO OPERATORS

The enormous expense incurred by the operators in their fight to break the union is shown by the output figures of the four scab mines—

Said President Hall—

About 1,600 union men were formerly employed, and the daily production was about 8,500 tons. Now between 800 and 900 scabs turn out 2,200 tons.

The difficulties encountered in maintaining even a skeleton force are enormous. Out of 40 scabs imported in one day 38 came out within 24 hours.

Every effort is made to prevent us talking to the scabs. At one mine three electric siren whistles were put up, which blow day and night to drown out the calls of our pickets to the scabs.

One day a picket stood from 9 in the morning until 11 at night with a megaphone to his lips. During this entire period the sirens never stopped for an instant.

DEPUTIES RULE CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA

In central Pennsylvania the companies are not employing coal and iron police, but are depending on hordes of deputy sheriffs.

These deputies are worse than mine guards—

Said President Marks—

We can, in some measure, exert influence to restrain the latter from excesses, but the sheriffs are owned body and soul by the mine operators through the corrupt political machine.

The strike in this field has cost the operators enough to pay the Jacksonville scale for two years. A number of the mine owners are willing to deal with us, and did do so for several months after the expiration of the Jacksonville agreement, but because of some mysterious influence which they dared not defy, they were forced to break relations.

What is behind this determined campaign to starve and coerce honest, peaceful, and industrious citizens into slavery?

A great conspiracy of railroads, banks, and public-utility corporations!

Here is a series of facts, compiled and issued by the United Mine Workers, which clearly establishes this fact:

MORE EVIDENCE OF CONSPIRACY

It is well known that the Pennsylvania Railroad has been cooperating with the Pittsburgh Coal Co., the Hillman Coal & Coke Co., the Jones & Laughlin Steel Co., the Inland Steel Co., the Wheeling Steel Co., the Bethlehem Mines Corporation, and others in the policy of eliminating the union and sustaining the action of the Pittsburgh Coal Co. in repudiating its contract with the United Mine Workers of America. It is public knowledge also that the Pittsburgh Terminal Coal Corporation, which refused to make an agreement with its employees after April 1, 1927, enjoyed the sustaining counsel and assistance of the Pennsylvania Railroad in this decision.

All of this activity on the part of the Pennsylvania Railroad, in conjunction with the above-named coal companies, has for its purpose the destruction of the United Mine Workers of America and the degradation of the wages of coal-mine workers.

RAILROAD INFLUENCE IN OHIO

Not only did the Pittsburgh Coal Co. and the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. influence the wholesale repudiation of the Jacksonville agreement in western Pennsylvania, but this powerful influence was used also to direct and control the policies of coal operators in Ohio as well. The Pittsburgh Coal Co. owned mines in Ohio. When it scrapped its agreement in Pennsylvania it also scrapped it in Ohio and employed the same tactics there that it employed in Pennsylvania. A few other companies in Ohio also repudiated the agreement, but the majority of Ohio operators did not. However, upon expiration of the Jacksonville agreement the Ohio operators fell in behind the leadership of the Pittsburgh Coal Co. and refused to negotiate a new agreement with the miners except upon the basis of a heavy reduction in wages.

The Pennsylvania Railroad, the New York Central Railroad, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, and other interstate railroads with lines in the Ohio coal fields lined up behind this policy and, under the lash of these railroad companies, the Ohio operators have fought and still are fighting to destroy the United Mine Workers of America and reduce wages. As a result of this policy practically all of the mines in Ohio are idle, 40,000 mine workers have been out of work since April 1, 1927, coal production in Ohio is negligible, while the railroads are shipping coal from other States into Ohio for their own use. The result is destitution, suffering, and starvation for 200,000 men, women, and children of the coal-mining section of Ohio and business depression and bankruptcy for business men and merchants.

COAL ORDERS WITHHELD

A purchasing agent of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. informed an operator in the Crooksville, Ohio, district that he could not consider giving him an order for coal as long as he operated his mine on a union basis. This purchasing agent told this operator that if he would operate his mine nonunion the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. would buy his coal and pay him a price that would make him a profit. This purchasing agent said to this operator: "We are not going to contribute any more to that damnable union."

An operator of a mine near Coshocton, Ohio, was advised by the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. that it would support him if he would operate his mine nonunion. This operator told officials of the United Mine Workers of America that he could not operate on a union basis and sell his coal.

An operator of a mine near Roseville, Ohio, operating on a union basis, sought a contract with the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. for the sale of his coal. The purchasing agent of the Pennsylvania told this operator: "I will pay no price for fuel that will justify the miners' Jacksonville scale."

THE CANCELED CONTRACT

A coal company whose mine is on the line of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad in the Bellaire (Ohio) field had a contract with the Baltimore & Ohio to supply coal to that railroad. In the summer of 1927 this coal company signed a contract with the United Mine Workers of America in which it agreed to continue paying the wage rates provided in the Jacksonville scale, pending a final settlement of the wage controversy between operators and miners. Five days after publication of the fact that this temporary agreement had been signed the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad canceled its contract with this coal company, and officials of the company say the railroad took this action because of the signing of this temporary agreement.

The Pennsylvania Railroad Co. informed the operators of three mines in the Crooksville (Ohio) field that, if these companies would start their mines on a nonunion basis, the Pennsylvania would buy their coal and pay them a price sufficient to guarantee a profit.

RAILROADS REFUSED TO DELIVER CARS

The operator of a mine in Jefferson County, Ohio, on the tracks of the Wabash Railroad, signed a temporary agreement with the United Mine Workers of America to continue paying the Jacksonville scale, pending a permanent settlement of the wage question, and that he started his mine and loaded three cars of coal. When he ordered more cars for loading he was informed by the railroad company that it had no more cars. Being unable to obtain cars for loading purposes under these circumstances, this operator's mine is idle while railroad-fuel coal is being shipped into the State of Ohio from other States where miners' wages have been depressed to very low figures.

The Pennsylvania Railroad Co. is standing 60 per cent of any losses that may accrue to a coal company whose mine, near Shadyside, Ohio, is now operated nonunion. This company has imported and still is importing green, inexperienced men to work in its mine, some of these men being recruited in eastern cities and many more from the cotton fields of the Southern States.

RAILROADS PRACTICE A GAUGE IN FREIGHT RATES

When the present freight-rate structure of the country was established by the Interstate Commerce Commission the large railroads told the commission they were paying from $2.20 to $2.40 a ton for their locomotive coal, and that this fact should be taken into consideration by the commission in rate making. Freight rates were based upon that price for coal. Now, however, these same railroads have hammered down the price of coal until they are arbitrarily refusing to pay more than $1.60 to $1.75 a ton for coal, thus reducing their own operating cost, but they are still collecting the same rates for hauling freight and passengers that they charged when they paid $2.20 to $2.40 for coal. Coal companies can not pay decent, living wages to their miners and sell their coal at $1.60 a ton.

RAILROADS REFUSE TO BUY INDIANA UNION-MINED COAL

In Indiana, representatives of the Pennsylvania Railroad encouraged the Indiana producers to resist the making of a wage agreement at the Miami, Fla., conference of operators and miners of the central competitive field in February, 1927. Mr. E. D. Logsdon, president of the Knox County Consolidated Coal Co., of Indiana, large producers of fuel coal for the Pennsylvania Railroad, assumed leadership of the Indiana operators and organized the Indiana Bituminous Coal Operators' Association for resistance to the making of a new wage agreement and the necessity of beating down wages. Since the official termination of the strike in Indiana and Illinois, the Logsdon interests, the Pike County Coal Co., and other mines heretofore supplying railroad fuel for the Pennsylvania have declined to resume operations, because the Pennsylvania Railroad refuses to place any orders with these mines for railroad fuel mined under the existing wage rate—the Jacksonville scale. The Pennsylvania Railroad is fueling its lines in Indiana with coal brought in from the east and southeast at a higher cost than that for which Indiana coal could be purchased. And while this condition exists, the mines in the Indiana field are idle and thousands of miners out of work and reduced to a state of destitution.

COMPELLED TO CEASE OPERATIONS

In November, 1927, the Pennsylvania Railroad served notice on Indiana coal operators that, beginning December 1, that company would pay $1.60 a ton and no more for coal in Indiana. Under this ultimatum from the Pennsylvania Railroad, those Indian operators that had been supplying the Pennsylvania with coal were obliged either to close down their mines or attempt to operate nonunion with strike-breakers in a 100 per cent union-organized field. They chose the former course and closed their mines, thus throwing thousands of men out of work.

In issuing this ultimatum to Indiana operators, the Pennsylvania Railroad very well knew that the operators could not comply with the price terms and pay decent, living wages to their miners. It was well aware that in order to sell coal to the Pennsylvania Railroad at $1.60 a ton they would be compelled to ignore, repudiate, and break away from their contract with the United Mine Workers of America, which was negotiated and signed at Terre Haute, Ind., in the summer of 1927.

Whether by understanding and agreement; by concert of action; or mere coincidence, the attitude of the New York Central Railroad, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, and other railroads in Indiana in this matter are parallel with the policy of the Pennsylvania Railroad. All are working for elimination of the United Mine Workers of America from the bituminous coal industry. With the miners' union destroyed and out of the way, there would be no minimum limit to the wage reductions which might then be forced upon the mine workers of the country, for they would then be without any means of self-protection against such onslaughts.

NEW YORK CENTRAL INTERESTS WOULD ELIMINATE THE UNION

As further proof of this fact, the New York Central Railroad, through its subsidiary coal company, the Clearfield Bituminous Corporation, has assumed the leadership of the commercial operators in the Central Pennsylvania bituminous producing field, first, in terminating its contract with the United Mine Workers of America on June 30, 1927; and, second, in the application of the policy of elimination of the Union, entailing evictions, injunctions, employment of armed guards and gunmen, coal and iron police, and the assistance of the Pennsylvania State constabulary.

Mr. F. H. Herriman, president of the Clearfield Bituminous Corporation, which is owned by the New York Central Railroad, in a telegram to Secretary of Labor Davis on December 13, 1927, advised that his interests would never again deal with the United Mine Workers of America and considered the elimination of the United Mine Workers of America as imperative.

The United Mine Workers of America is the one and only restraining influence in this country that prevents the New York Central and other strike-breaking interests from hammering coal miners' wages down to the poverty and starvation level. It is for that reason that these powerful interests are endeavoring so diligently to destroy the union.

WESTERN RAILROADS DEMAND LOW-WAGE COAL

This general campaign for the destruction of the United Mine Workers of America and lowering of miners' wages is not confined to eastern fields alone. The Western Coal & Mining Co., a subsidiary of the Missouri Pacific Railroad, maintained contractual relations with the United Mine Workers of America for years. But when the Jacksonville agreement expired and the large eastern roads began their fight against the union, the Western Coal & Mining Co. used its full power and influence to prevent coal companies in Kansas from making a new agreement with the union.

The Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railroad openly asserted that it would not buy a pound of coal produced under the Jacksonville agreement, and it has religiously followed that policy. That company buys in the low-wage, nonunion fields of other States all the coal it consumes in the State of Kansas, while Kansas mines stand idle and Kansas miners are unemployed.

The Frisco Railroad buys in Kansas about 25 per cent of the total amount of coal which it consumes in that State. It ships in some coal from the low-wage nonunion field of western Kentucky and the rest of its supply from the nonunion field of Alabama where wages of mine workers are as low as $2 a day.

Similar conditions exist in other States.

NONUNION COAL PREFERRED

A high official of the Rock Island Railroad visited Appanoose County, Iowa, in his private car, and while he was there he notified coal operators of that county who were operating with union labor that they should immediately prepare to run their mines on a nonunion basis, as the Rock Island had adopted a policy of buying no coal from mines that were operated on a union basis. He said the company was going to put this policy in effect as soon as possible and that it was warning the operators to prepare themselves. Recently the Rock Island refused to take any coal in Appanoose County that was mined by union men. The company shipped coal to Iowa from Trinidad, Colo., several hundred miles distant, although union-mined Iowa coal would have cost it much less than the Colorado product when transportation charges are considered.

The Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad is buying practically no coal in Iowa where union miners are employed. This company is shipping coal for its own use in Iowa from nonunion fields of Kentucky, on which the freight rate alone is far more than Iowa coal would cost it on its engines.

DISASTROUS EFFECTS OF LOW WAGES

During the years when the Pittsburgh Coal Co. operated its mines with union miners and paid the union scale of wages its average cost of production of coal was $1.89 per ton. Since it repudiated its agreement with the United Mine Workers of America and employed strike breakers its production cost has been $3.78 per ton. These figures are taken from the reports of the Pittsburgh Coal Co. A similar situation exists with reference to other companies that followed the lead of the Pittsburgh Coal Co., under the lash of the Pennsylvania Railroad, the New York Central, and other interstate railroad companies that are parties to this conspiracy.

THE UNFAIR FREIGHT RATES

But there is still another phase of the situation:

The northern fields in Ohio and Pennsylvania have been the victims of discriminatory freight rates to such an extent as to utterly disrupt the natural flow of coal from the nearest fields to the industrial centers and big city markets.

I refer to the scandalous and long-standing "cargo rate cases," which have been repeatedly before the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Here are some figures:

In 1919 11½ per cent of the Lake port coal originated in the Kanawha district of West Virginia. In 1925 this had increased to 30 per cent

The Pocahontas region shipped 5¼ per cent in 1909 and 25½ per cent in 1925.

The Pittsburgh region shipped 50 per cent of the entire Lake port coal in 1909 and only 8 per cent in 1925.

Now, when we come to railroads we find the same story:

In 1909 the Chesapeake & Ohio shipped 7½ per cent of the Lake coal and 38¾ in 1925.

The Norfolk & Western shipped 6¾ in 1909 and 19¼ in 1925.

In this period the Lancaster & Northern increased its shipments from nothing to 14¾ per cent.

The Baltimore & Ohio, which serves the northern West Virginia fields, decreased from 17½ to 10 per cent.

The New York Central lines, including the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie, shipped 22¼ per cent in 1909 and 3¼ per cent in 1925.

The Pennsylvania had 34¼ per cent of the Lake coal in 1909 and only 3½ per cent in 1925.

Now, here are a very few out of many examples which can be cited to explain this astonishing change by which an old established industry in one section was wrecked to build up another much farther from the customers.

Here are some of the freight rates on a Toledo base:

Pittsburgh, 281 miles, $2.39 per ton.

Kanawha, 381 miles, exactly the same, $2.39 per ton.

Pocahontas, 443 miles for $2.64; 162 miles longer haul for 25 cents more in freight charges.

McRoberts district, 476 miles, for $2.39; 195 miles for nothing.

But when we come to seacoast rates we find that the same discrimination exists:

From Pittsburgh to New York, 499.8 miles, the rate is $3.19 per ton.

From Kanawha to Hampton Roads, 524.4 miles, the rate is $2.62.

Kentucky sends coal to Hampton Roads, 612.3 miles, for $2.72.

The Pittsburgh to Philadelphia rate is $2.72 for 415.6 miles and the Pittsburgh to Baltimore rate is $2.65 for 356.4 miles.

CONTEST IN STARVATION

The Hon. CLYDE KELLY, Representative of the thirty-third Pennsylvania congressional district, has this to say of the situation.

This situation has been repeatedly called to the attention of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but every time we raise the issue we are reminded by the commisison that wages are higher in the union fields than in the nonunion fields; and are told that wages, and not freight rates, are the cause of our trouble.

A competition in wage slashing is invited by this attitude, but it is not a solution of the problem. Obviously all that would result would be a test of the comparative ability of the miners in various sections to endure starvation.

If the recent cuts in freight rates from the northern fields to Lake ports had been granted 18 months ago, I believe the present state of affairs could have been avoided.

THE RED CROSS HAS BEEN INFORMED

My friends, I could continue and tell you a lot more, but time will not permit me to do so.

Mr. CARSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY. Yes; gladly.

Mr. CARSS. I would like to ask the gentleman if the attention of the American Red Cross has been called to the misery that exists among the women and children and the conditions which the gentleman has elaborated upon this afternoon.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, let me say in reply to the very proper inquiry of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CARSS], that has been done, and I rather hestitate to discuss this phase of the situation because of the likelihood of being misunderstood. We all have great respect for the Red Cross, and we should have great respect for it. It has done wonderful work, but I can not afford to be accused of either sidestepping or dodging the question very properly asked a moment ago. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Minnesota, yes; the attention of the Red Cross has been called to this matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mrs. ROGERS]. The Chair wishes to notify the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he has occupied 50 minutes and has 10 additional minutes.

A RATHER PECULIAR ATTITUDE

Mr. CASEY. I thank the Chair.

The attention of the Red Cross has been called to the matter with this result, and I will put the statement in the RECORD. A woman by the name of Flowers in charge of the Red Cross at Pittsburgh was called upon by Lowell M. Limpus, the reporter for the New York Daily News, of whom I have previously spoken. She said, "It is their fault; their fathers could relieve the situation by going back to work." He said, "Their fathers will not work at the mines under the present conditions; they brought it on themselves." She said, "We are not to blame." "Neither are the children," said this man Limpus. "They did not declare the strike; it is not their fault that they are cold and hungry; there is an emergency at your door as serious as the New England flood. What is the great mother Red Cross going to do about it?" Her answer was, "Nothing."

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY. I yield with pleasure to my friend from Texas.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I want to state that the statement the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania has just made has made a great impression on one Member of this House, and that is myself. I want to ask the gentleman if there has been any bill introduced in this Congress that would relieve this intolerable situation?

Mr. CASEY. I am talking about a resolution that I introduced in the House for an investigation into this matter. Now, let me answer the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CARSS]. Unfortunately the Red Cross in our State takes this very unfortunate position: That it makes no difference how many women and children are starving and freezing to death, the men of the house can relieve the situation by going back to scab in the mines, and therefore they will do nothing to relieve the distress that may exist. The Red Cross says let them go to the poor board for relief. Under the laws of Pennsylvania the poor board can only give relief to individuals who have declared themselves paupers. To say the least, it is a rather untenable position for the great Red Cross to take.

THEIR UNION IS THEIR ALL

Let me say to you, my friends, that many of you do not understand what the union means to these men and women. It means more to them than their Government officials, because it is the only thing that they have to rely upon to see that they get justice; they depend upon our great Government and their union working together to protect them from the injustices that have been heaped upon them, as I am trying to explain, and that is why they love the union. Notwithstanding their love for their children, notwithstanding their love for their women, notwithstanding they love their country, many of them would rather see their women and children die from hunger, lying on the hillsides of western Pennsylvania, their bones bleaching in the sun of the coming spring than to have it said that they were scabs. [Applause.]

Now, let me give you a typical illustration of how these men feel about the question of scabbing. During the strike in the soft-coal fields when the late President Harding was in the White House he undertook to force a condition of mining coal with bayonets. He forgot that you have to have miners to mine coal. So they went into western Pennsylvania with the soldiers and they put Old Glory on top of the mine tipple. While the miners were holding a meeting of their union one morning word came to the president of the local, who happened to be a man who served with honor and distinction in the World War, that the soldiers had arrived and placed the United States flag on top of the mine tipple. He said, "Brothers, we will adjourn the meeting and go down and see what is going on."

WILL STARVE BUT NOT SCAB

He organized the march, and they went to the mine tipple; when they got there he said, "Uncover," and every man uncovered. He said, "Salute the flag, eyes right," and then this man speaking for his organization said, "Old Glory, we love you. Old Glory, we are willing to fight for you. Yes, Old Glory, we love you so much that we are ready to die for you; but, Old Glory, we will not scab for you." [Applause.]

That is the attitude of these men. They are willing to serve; they are willing to do anything for their country or their flag; they are ready to die for our flag and our institutions; but they are unwilling to be called a scab. There is no word in the vocabulary of the American people that is so distasteful to them.

Let me say in conclusion, and I hope the Chair will be patient and lenient and look the other way from the clock for a minute, that I may say a word about this field of unrest.

I hold in my hand a pamphlet prepared by the United Mine Workers of America, pointing out the activities of communistic and bolshevistic Russia and how she has financed its propaganda within the labor organizations of the United States.

My time is about up. I will not have time to read what it contains. Under leave to extend I will insert it in the RECORD so Members may read it.

UNION BULWARK AGAINST BOLSHEVISM

Let me say there is no organization in this country that has done more to hold back the false philosophy of communism and bolshevism than the great United Mine Workers of America. [Applause.] At every convention of this organization they have their fights with the bolshevists and communists. Not only every convention, but every night of the week they have these fights, because at almost every local union meeting these people are in there with their false propaganda trying to undermine the institutions of our great country, trying to poison the minds of these men who are so terribly persecuted.

This country and this House owe to the United Mine Workers of America a debt of gratitude that we will never be able to repay for the service they have done along this line. You may not know about it, but they have done a wonderful service for this country.

But what about this situation? The bolshevists and communist organizations have their trained agitators out in the coal fields of western Pennsylvania spreading the seeds of dissension, trying to get it into the hearts and the minds of these people that their leaders, Mr. Lewis, Mr. Murray, and Mr. Kennedy, and other officers, are squandering their money, that they are the ones who are responsible for their hardships, their privations, and their distress. This is done to try and get control of this great organization so they can carry on their damnable work of destruction.

THE GRAVE QUESTION INVOLVED

What will be the result if they succeed, God alone knows, but let me say to you that if they ever succeed in destroying this great organization of the United Mine Workers of America, or if they ever succeed in destroying the great organization, the American Federation of Labor, then God Almighty help the people of the United States and God Almighty help the institutions of our beloved country.

You have a sample of it in Russia. Do you want it here? Do you want the working class to be a disorganized mob, a fertile field for all kinds of seed of poison and treachery, or is it better to have them organized, well disciplined, with confidence in their leaders, confidence in their Government and its institutions, with leaders who believe in and preach the doctrine of the Constitution—government such as the United States. Gentlemen, I say to you, in conclusion, that we have a very grave question before us. [Prolonged applause.]

Following is the pamphlet above referred to:

(This series of six articles was prepared by the United Mine Workers of America, disclosing the attempt that is being made by the red forces, under the direct supervision of Moscow, to seize control of the organized labor movement of America and use it as the base from which to carry on the communist effort for the overthrow of the American Government. These articles are the result of an independent searching investigation on the part of the United Mine Workers of America which led directly to original sources.)

THE AMAZING SCHEME

ARTICLE I

The United Mine Workers of America with this article begins an exposé of the communist revolutionary movement in America, as promoted and fostered by the Communist International at Moscow, and dealing with it as it involves the welfare of the miners' union, and other similar labor organizations, and the interests of the American people as a whole.

The purpose and object of the United Mine Workers of America in bringing to the attention of the American people the far-reaching and intensive activities of the communist organization in this country is twofold. The United Mine Workers of America wants the public to know what this thing is. It wants the public to know something about the fight which the miners' union is waging to stamp it out. First, it desires to reveal and make known the sinister and destructive groups and elements attempting to "bore from within" its own ranks and membership and to seize possession of the organization, and, through such seizure, to later gain possession of all legitimate trade-unions; second, to inform the American people of the scope and purport of the hostile and inimical movement being carried on within their midst.

Imported revolution is knocking at the door of the United Mine Workers of America and of the American people. The seizure of this union is being attempted as the first step in the realization of a thoroughly organized program of the agencies and forces behind the Communist International at Moscow for the conquest of the American Continent.

The overthrow and destruction of this Government, with the establishment of an absolute and arbitrary dictatorship, and the elimination of all forms of popular voice in governmental affairs, is being attempted on a more gigantic scale, with more resolute purpose, and with more crafty design, than at any time in the history of this Nation.

The communist régime at Moscow, bent on world conquest, is promoting and directing one of the best organized and most far-reaching campaigns in America that any country has ever been confronted with. The communist organization on the American Continent is composed of more than 6,000 active leaders and lieutenants, and approximately 1,000,000 members adherents and sympathizers, scattered in every State and Province of the United States and Canada, and who are actively or tacitly promoting the scheme to import bolshevism and sovietism to this side of the Atlantic.

This campaign affects the people of the Dominion of Canada as much as it does the United States. The revolutionary agents of Moscow are working as actively and energetically among the people of the one country as they are among the people of the other. Proof of this statement is found in the recent red outbreak among the misguided miners of Nova Scotia, where armed revolution was preached; where an illegal strike occurred and the red movement was only broken by the vigorous and forcible action of John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers of America.

The major points in this revolutionary program of the communists as aimed against the United Mine Workers of America and other legitimate trade-unions and the people of the United States and Canada are:

1. Overthrow and destruction of the Federal, State, and provincial Governments, with the elimination of existing constitutional forms and foundations.

2. Establishment of a soviet dictatorship, absolute in its exercise of power, owing allegiance to, and conceding the authority only of the communist, or Third International, at Moscow, as a "governmental" substitute.

3. Destruction of all social, economic, and political institutions as they exist at this time.

4. Seizure of all labor unions through a process of "boring from within" them, and utilizing them as a strategic instrument in fulfillment of their revolutionary designs upon organized and constitutional government.

5. Invasion of the United Mine Workers of America, with the ouster of its present officials and leaders and the substitution of a leadership of communists, that it may be used as an instrumentality for seizing the other labor unions of America, and for eventually taking possession of the country.

6. A well-organized movement is being promoted within the 4 railroad brotherhoods and 16 railroad trade-unions to amalgamate all railroad workers into "one departmentalized industrial union," controlled by a single leader of communist principle and affiliation, and owing allegiance to the communist organization.

7. Seizure of the American Federation of Labor, with the ouster of its officials, and through such seizure gaining control of all its affiliated units and trade-unions.

8. Conversion of all craft trade-unions into single units of workers within an industry known as industrial unions, with coordination under a super-soviet union owing allegiance to, and accepting the mandates of, the Communist International and its subsidiary, the Red Trade Union International at Moscow.

9. Through conquest and subjugation of the labor unions, and conversion and mobilization of farmers and other related groups, the overthrow of existing institutions, and the creation of a condition similar to that which now prevails in Russia.

The data and the facts set forth in this and the following articles represent months of careful independent research among original documents and records covering the whole of the communist movement in America and Europe, particularly as it has been injected into the ranks of the United Mine Workers of America, the American Federation of Labor, and labor organizations in general.

The movement has been traced back to its original purposes and intents and followed in all of its phases to its present status in this country.

Manifestos, programs of action, communications, and revolutionary documents have been examined and compared. Through these factors it has been possible to weigh and gauge the design and purpose of the communist movement, examine its scope and range, and to determine the extent to which it has entered into the American social, economic, and political fabric, as well as to chart the major outlines of its immediate future program of action.

The menace of bolshevism in America—the United States and Canada—is not a figment of imagination or an invention of hysteria. It is not a passing fancy or a deceiving mirage. Nicolai Lenin and his group of associates at Moscow are waging a definite contest for the subjugation and seizure of the United States and Canada. They would destroy the present Governments, destroy the sovereignty and independence of the people, and, in their place, enthrone the idols and fallacies of bolshevism.

Millions of dollars are being spent in this contest. Much of the money is coming from continental Europe and the remainder is being collected through organizations and committees created for that purpose or by donations and contributions of sympathetic or well-intentioned people in the United States.

Immediately before the start of the miners' strike on April 1, 1922, the sum of $1,110,000 was sent into the United States, by way of Canada, from Moscow, for the purpose of enabling the communist agents to participate in the strike. Behind this move was the scheme to overthrow the leadership of the union and then convert the strike into an "armed insurrection" against the Government of the United States.

The massacre of the strike breakers at Herrin, Ill., was engineered by these communist agents "boring from within" the miners' union. According to their own statements, they were engaged for seven weeks beforehand in their preparations for a tragic occurrence of this kind at some point in southern Illinois as a means to "arousing the workers to revolutionary action." Details of this incident will be disclosed in a subsequent article of this series.

In the coal fields of southwestern Pennsylvania, where the strike started by orderly process, mine plants, tunnels, and power-transmission lines were blown up, the homes of miners were wrecked, and men were beaten or injured by these communist agents in an effort, under the instructions of Gregory Zinoviev, president of the Communist International to arouse "the revolutionary spirit of the workers and prepare them for the coming revolution in America." All of these things show what American employers would have to deal and contend with if the communist plans were to succeed and the present legitimate American labor movement were weakened or destroyed.

Three times in three years the bolshevik leaders at Moscow have attempted armed insurrection and revolution in the United States. The first instance was in connection with the steel strike in 1919. The second was in the "outlaw" switchmen's strike in 1920; and the third was in the railroad and coal strikes in 1922. In the strikes of 1922 these communist agents were arrayed as much against the leaders and officials of the miners' and railroad unions as they were against other loyal citizens of the Nation.

In each of these strikes the communist agents, working under instructions which originated at Moscow, have sought to turn them into revolutionary uprisings that would accomplish the overthrow of goverment in America and establish in its place a proletarian dictatorship that recognized and accepted only the mandates of the Communist International.

It may be stated, incidentally, that the growth and effectiveness of the communist movement in America has been handicapped and limited by the immutable policy of the Communist International that its chosen representatives must control everything of which they come into possession. Exercise of this control is the definite aim, and always the major consideration, in every amalgamation, reorganization, or new enterprise with which they are associated, whether it be in the seizure of a labor union or in the promotion of the aspirations of a candidate for political preferment. They recognize no voice except their own.

The "thesis of tactics" adopted by the Third World Congress of the Communist International at Moscow says:

"From the very first day of its establishment the Communist International has distinctly and unambiguously devoted itself to the purpose of participating in the trade-unions and in the struggles of the laboring masses, and of conducting this struggle on a communist basis and of erecting during the struggle great revolutionary communist mass parties, waiving the idea of the formation of small communist sects for the attainment of influence upon the working class solely by agitation and propaganda."

Demand by the communist "inner circle" of leaders, consisting of a dozen men, for supreme authority for themselves has been the obstacle that has prevented the actual realization of their plans several times to seize organizations in this country. It was this demand that caused the minority communists to split from the majority communists in the early stages of their movement in this country, resulting in a dual movement ever since. Because of their essential revolutionary purpose and design, these communists have not believed that the control of any enterprise or agency which they might need later as a revolutionary medium could be trusted to the keeping of anyone who was not of their chosen inner circle, amenable to their discipline, and servile to the mandates of the Communist International.

This phase of policy is in keeping with their principle that the soviet dictatorship, when once established, is absolute and does not recognize in the conduct of its affairs either the voice or the representation of the people. Indeed, their conception of the individual is that he is of no consequence to the general scheme of human affairs; that only the masses are to be taken into consideration, and they directed by the superauthority and "wisdom" of a soviet dictatorship.

Wherever possible in conducting their activities in America the communists have attempted to "bore from within" organizations already existing and to utilize them for their ultimate ends and purposes. They have been particularly active in trying to "bore from within" the United Mine Workers of America for the reasons that it is the largest single labor organization in the country, includes a larger number of races and nationalities among its members, and is the nearest approach, in their opinion, to a "one big union," which is their ideal conception of a labor union and their objective for all labor unions. In this attempt these communists have met with the determined opposition of President Lewis and other strong leaders of the miners' union, who are determined that the union shall not be converted into a bolshevik institution.

The same tactics have been used continuously for four years to seize and control the American Federation of Labor, the railroad labor organizations, and various other trade groups. The communists have declined to establish rival or competing organizations to these federations as long as the possibility existed that they might eventually take possession of them and annex them to their revolutionary movement in America.

Trade-unions have been regarded by the communists from the very outset as their first objective, and their eventual stronghold, in overthrowing the Government and seizing the country.

In these unions they have recognized an opportunity to get in close contact with the labor masses, establish relations and connections with them, and imbue them with hatred and hostility toward the existing order of things. For this reason, the Communist Party of America, with its allies, the Workers Party of America, the Trade Union Educational League, and the Friends of Soviet Russia, under the instructions of the Communist International and its subsidiary, the Red Trade Labor Union International, is using all of its industrial contacts to segregate and restrict the control and management of the trade-unions in the hands of its leaders and official groups.

That this design may be more easily carried out the members of these communist parties are constantly becoming members of trade-unions, thus acting in accordance with the prearranged plan of their central executive committees that they shall enter these unions, and, acting in concert, gradually absorb them as a part of the communist revolutionary movement.

The program of action of the United Communist Party, which was accepted and affirmed in slightly diluted form by the Communist Party of America in the convention at Woodstock, N. Y., in 1921, and later accepted with slight variations by the Workers Party of America, known as the "legal branch," says:

"The United Communist Party considers as one of the most serious and immediate problems the question of the best method of breaking up the bureaucratic control and transforming the union structure into a machine of revolutionary action. The United Communist Party confirms the present necessity of militant workers remaining with the large mass of organized workers, regardless of the reactionary aims of the unions, and, by determined and coordinated strength, turning these unions to the revolutionary cause. The United Communist Party section of the Communist International is the instrument for that coordination of the revolutionary work within the unions."

Compulsion and force is to be applied to industrial workers to move them to become communists, according to the doctrines of the Communist Party of America. Its adherents are told:

"Obviously, many nonrevolutionary workers must be taken into the most revolutionary of unions, even compelled to join against their wills."

Conducting and promoting the revolutionary campaign in the United States is a secret party organization, directed and controlled by representatives of the Communist International. This is the Communist Party of America. It is purely a revolutionary organization and makes no pretense at legality. It boldly proclaims to its members that it is the "illegal" party, and designates itself as such. Technically it is known as the "underground" party. This party has at its head the supreme executive revolutionary committee in America, responsible only to Lenin, Zinoviev, and other officials of the Communist International. It does not recognize any superior power or agency in the United States. Its work is done secretly; the identities of its officials and leaders are concealed behind assumed names. Its letters and records are in code letters and numerals. Its members are accepted only after investigation and examination, and remain on probation for a period of six months before they are received into full membership. Its meetings are held secretly with the participants gathering at a preliminary rendezvous and proceeding to an assembly room known in advance only to the leader.

On the surface, working partly in the open, is another revolutionary organization, known as the Workers Party of America, and created, under instructions from the Communist International, by the Communist Party of America. It is known as the "legal" party. Its primary purpose is to shield the "underground" or "illegal" party and conceal the revolutionary activity of the real soviet agents in America. The mission of this party is fundamentally the same as that of the Communist Party of America, i. e., to overthrow the Government of the United States and establish a bolshevik régime.

Joined with these two revolutionary parties and assisting them as one of their direct subsidiaries is an alleged labor-union movement, "boring from within" the American Federation of Labor, and seeking to seize and destroy it and enmesh the trade-unions of the United States in the bolshevik movement and conquest of the United States. This organization is the Trade Union Educational League, headed by William Z. Foster, with headquarters at Chicago.

This league is cultivated and promoted by the organizers and agents of the Communist and Workers Parties and is the direct instrumentality of Lenin and Zinoviev of the Communist International, and Losovsky, of the subsidiary Red Trade Labor Union International, for amalgamating the labor unions into the world revolutionary movement of the communists.

Through this organization the revolutionary leaders in America are making a nation-wide attempt to obtain control of the American Federation of Labor, reorganize the craft unions on the basis of "one big union" in an industry and weld them into the central revolutionary agency in America.

Working in conjunction with the two communist parties is another politico-industrial instrumentality, the Friends of Soviet Russia, an organization whose aim is to give free lectures to disseminate and propagate communistic and disloyal doctrines, designed to undermine the American Government, destroy the confidence of the people in its principles and foundation, and prepare the way for a soviet, or "proletarian," dictatorship.

The Friends of Soviet Russia is purely a communistic enterprise, reorganized from the American Labor Alliance, and through the latter agency controlled and directed by the central executive committee of the Communist Party of America. It has been, and is, one of the effective agencies of the communist groups distributing disloyal and revolutionary doctrines and propaganda among the immigrant masses in America, promoting labor unrest and discord, and seeking to induct the foreign residents of the country into the Trade Union Educational League, the Workers Party of America, or other revolutionary agencies and instrumentalities under the control of the Communist Party of America.

Active among the "intellectual" classes of the country, and posing as a champion of the "liberties of speech, press, and assembly," is the American Civil Liberties Union at New York. This organization is working in harmony and unity with the communist superstructure in America, engaged in the dissemination of radical utterances and propaganda, and conducting a nation-wide campaign for the liberation of bolshevik agents and disloyal agitators who have been convicted under the war-time laws, or the syndicalist laws of different States, for unpatriotic or revolutionary activities. It is the successor of the American Union Against Militarism, which consistently opposed the military draft act during the war and gave comfort and assistance to the conscientious objectors who resisted military service.

While offering aid to scores of individuals who have been arrested or convicted for violation of national or State laws, it has not in a single instance come to the assistance of a man or woman who did not profess radical sentiments, or who was not allied with the communist, the anarchist, the revolutionary, or the radical movements in America.

Fifty-two persons, holding a total of 325 directorates in 45 organizations, are in control of the radical and revolutionary campaigns now being waged in this country. A systematic examination of the directorates of these organizations reveals the fact that they interlock into almost a single whole. While the ultraradical and discreet "liberal" groups meet occasionally, there is no real gap or breaking point, and in their general aspects they are fused into a united effort, giving mutual support to each other in their numerous activities. It is in this interlocking arrangement and mutual cooperation that the most insidious and dangerous aspect of the communist movement in America is found.

The key to the ultraradical movement in America, as promoted and fostered by the communist leaders at Moscow, is found in this interlocking arrangement. Through this mechanism these communist groups interlock also with the Communist International and the Red Trade Labor Union International at Moscow, so that the revolutionary movement in America is the direct offspring and agency of the communist régime in Russia, for the purpose of seizing and possessing themselves of the American Continent through the mediumship of revolution inspired and conducted from the stronghold of bolshevism on the other side of the Atlantic.

The details of this interlocking arrangement, together with the details of the communist activities in this country as they relate to the United Mine Workers of America and to other labor organizations, will be set forth in the succeeding articles.

ARTICLE II

The United Mine Workers of America, in presenting the second article exposing the activities of the communist revolutionary organization in America, calls attention to the fact that this movement is centered chiefly around and within the productive efforts of the country, and that its advancement is being sought through the encouragement of industrial strife and the breeding of distrust and misunderstanding between employers and labor unions.

In carrying out this design the communists are as much the foe of the trade-unions as they are of the employers. Their underlying purpose is to take possession of the unions as a step toward the ultimate realization of a soviet dictatorship in America.

There are persons who charge that the United Mine Workers is a red organization and that it works, sympathizes, and cooperates with and is dominated by communists and communist influences. But this is not true. The United Mine Workers of America has no sympathy with the communist movement in any of its phases. In fact, communists recognize the miners' union as their strongest and bitterest enemy in America. That is the reason why the Moscow masters put forth such a tremendous effort to cripple and seize the organization.

The possibility that the United Mine Workers of America would not be successful in the spring of 1922 in renewing the existing wage agreement with the coal operators, and that a suspension of work at the coal mines would take place on April 1, was realized by the Communist International, and the communist superorganization in America, more than eight months beforehand. Keenly alive to the peculiar relations that existed between the operators and the miners, they foresaw the eventuality of a cessation of work.

The coal operators had carefully watched the trend of the open-shop campaign, and it had been apparent for some time, even to the uninitiated, that as soon as this movement was sufficiently intrenched in industry an effort would be made to cripple the miners' union in the hope that there might be a lower labor cost within the coal industry.

Generally speaking, a strike does not injure a coal operator. Coal in the ground does not deteriorate, and losses caused by a strike can be added to the price of the coal when it is finally mined. Consequently, the coal operator has nothing to lose, and possibly much to gain, when a strike is precipitated.

Officials of the miners' union had known for a long while that the time was approaching when the strength and cohesion of their organization would be sorely tried. It was recognized by them that if a condition arose before April 1, which made it seem reasonably likely that a strike would wreck the miners' union, it would not be unwelcome to some of the nonunion and other interests in the coal industry. In fact, if responsibility for the upheaval could be shifted to the shoulders of the union, they might quietly agitate matters so that a strike would result.

Some of the coal-producing interests were chafing under the existing agreement with the union, and it was manifest that they would welcome any move that promised to put them on an open-shop basis.

These facts were well known to the officials of the Communist International at Moscow, and to their American advisors and emissaries who were visiting them frequently for purposes of consultation about industrial and political matters in America.

It is not surprising, therefore, to find Gregory Zinoviev, president of the Communist International, secretly instructing his American agents early in 1922 to foster and encourage the threatened breach between the operators and the mine workers. With the strategy of a field marshal Zinoviev sent the following instructions from Moscow to communist agents in the United States a few weeks before the start of the miners' strike on April 1, 1922:

"The central executive committee of the Communist Party of America must direct its particular attention to the progress of the strike of the miners of America.

"Agitators and propagandists must be sent to the strike regions.

"It is necessary to arouse striking coal miners to the point of armed insurrection. Let them blow up and flood the shafts. Shower the strike regions with proclamations and appeals. This arouses the revolutionary spirit of the workers and prepares them for the coming revolution in America."

These brief instructions contain the whole communist attitude toward the strike. They show that the prime purpose was to bring about disorder, violence, and riot which could be charged up against the United Mine Workers of America.

Into this troubled situation the communist group of America, under Zinoviev's instructions, were to thrust in their entire organization, and to create a condition within the strike which would eventually eliminate the officials of the miners' union, and enable them to extend the strike into a great industrial upheaval, involving, as they hoped, all labor unions and all industry. Thus the United Mine Workers of America was attacked by an underground enemy and had that enemy to fight at the same time that it was engaged in a tremendous contest with the coal operators. It was a significant coincidence that the two elements should attack the miners' union at the same time.

As the breach between the operators and the miners' union widened and it became apparent that a strike would not be averted, Zinoviev sent more specific instructions to America, directing that agitators and propagandists be sent into the coal region; that the towns and villages be showered with proclamations and appeals; that mine shafts be blown up and flooded; and that, as he said, "the revolutionary spirit of the workers be aroused for the coming revolution in America."

Participation of the communists in the strike started with their going quietly into the coal regions and pretending to cooperate with the officials of the union until it was manifest that the cessation of work was complete. Then they started broadcasting these regions with incendiary and inflammatory circulars, many of which were designed to breed distrust and suspicion of union officials among their followers. The more revolutionary of these documents originated at Cleveland, where the communist organization had concentrated the sum of $1,110,000, sent into the country by Zinoviev and his associates, for the purpose of financing the participation of their agents in the strike.

Other circulars were issued in Chicago and New York. Some of them were reprinted at Pittsburgh and Uniontown, Pa., Wheeling, W. Va., and Bellaire, Ohio. In every instance they were distributed to the miners by the district, section, and local organizers and agents of the Communist Party of America and the Workers Party of America, and who acted under the direct instructions of the central executive committees of these parties.

As far as was feasible the communists fitted their plants to the program of the United Mine Workers. Uninvited and unwelcome though they were, they worked within the union, and not as a dual organization. Only by secrecy and stealth did they launch their hostile and vicious campaign. Suspicion and distrust of the union officials was spread gradually among the rank and file of the miners, largely through whisperings of attempted or prospective betrayal, or acts of bad faith on their part.

They did not want a settlement of the strike by orderly process. They wanted a continuation and enlargement of it, with themselves in control, that would finally engulf the whole American industrial structure.
